Black Flag hopes to make inroads into the flea control area, the second largest insect control category, with its newly licensed line of indoor foggers bearing the Holiday name, which the company licensed from the Hills Chemical subsidiary of Colgate-Palmolive.

A pine-scented version of Black Flag ant and roach killer was added. Media spending totaled $4.8 million in 1985 for the Black Flag line.

Easy-Off oven cleaner kept its lead in the oven cleaning category with $4.3 million in measured spending. Sani-Flush holds a 10% share of the $240 million toilet bowl cleaner category, which is dominated by Bristol-Myers' Drackett Co.'s Vanish Bowl Brite, with a 30% share. Sani-Flush was supported by $3.7 million in measured media spending.

AHP's prescription drugs and medical supplies segment, its largest, had a 4.4% sales growth worldwide, although 7% domestically. Two major brands, Wyeth Laboratories' Ativan, a tranquilizer, and Inderal, a cardiovascular product, faced stiff competition from generic substitutes. Sales of the latter were hurt by generic competition in its $3.6 billion cardiovascular market.

Among consumer products in the group, Ayerst Laboratories entered the growing over-the-counter calcium supplement market (in 1985 the market expanded by 50%) with the national debut of Posture, supported by $3 million in spending. Ayerst's Riopan line of antacids was joined by an extra-strength version. The entry was supported by an $8 million media effort.

Wyeth Laboratories' sales were augmented by increased sales of its Ativan tranquilizer product, oral contraceptives, including the new Triphasil, which has the lowest total hormone content of any combination birth control pill currently available, and infant nourishment items.

On Jan. 1, 1986, AHP's Ives Laboratories was merged into Wyeth Laboratories. The merger created the second largest sales force in the industry. Ives markets Sectral, a once-a-day, cardioselective beta blocker for the treatment of hypertension and arrhythmia. A new drug application for additional use of Sectral in the treatment of angina is expected to be filed soon. In January, 1986, Wyeth received FDA approval for the nonsteroidal, anti-inflammatory drug Orudis, which entered the market in February. Cordarone, an anti-arrhythmic drug, also received FDA approval and was introduced in March.

AHP also entered the U.S. generic drug market by acquiring an 80% controlling interest in Quantum Pharmics Ltd., a private generic drug marketer.

William F. Emswiler was elected corporate vp and treasurer to replace Joseph J. Carr, who was named senior vp of Wyeth Laboratories. John R. Considine became comptroller.

Profitability was short-lived for American Motors Corp., which in 1985 posted a loss for the fifth time in six years, with the modest full-year profit in 1984 marking the only exception to the trend.

AMC made deep cuts in its white-collar work force during 1985 and was able to extract concessions from unionized employes to reduce over-all costs. In an attempt to gain ad efficiencies, the company consolidated advertising at one agency, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, which had been doing only Jeep advertising, and dropped Grey Advertising, which had handled Renault.

But AMC made no over-all cuts in its marketing spending and also held fast to its five-year, $2 billion new products development program begun in late 1982 that is intended to move the company into new, more profitable market segments.

AMC's share of the 11 million U.S. passenger car market was 1.2% in 1985, down from 2% in 1984 and 2.5% in 1983. Long the No. 4 domestic producer of automobiles, AMC in 1985 fell to No. 5, as American Honda Motor Co., Gardena, Cal., sold 145,976 U.S.-built cars, compared with AMC car sales of 123,449, a 35% decrease from 1984 car sales of 190,255.

AMC subsidiary Jeep Corp. fared better, as U.S. sales increased by 18% to 181,389. Jeep's share of the 1.3 million unit four-wheel-drive utility and recreational vehicle market was 12.9% in 1985, compared with 13.5% in 1984 and 9.9% in 1983. Introduction of Jeep's first two-wheel-drive model in September, 1985, the Comanche compact pickup, resulted in Jeep gaining 0.4% of the two-wheel-drive pickup market for the year.

Worldwide, AMC sold 151,481 automobiles, a 39% decrease from the year earlier. The company sold 240,288 Jeep vehicles, a gain of 24%. Total vehicle sales of 391,769 were down 12%. Sales outside North America accounted for 5% of total dollar sales for the third consecutive year.

AMC's problems on the passenger car side were related to its reliance on the small car segment, which over-all has been shrinking even as it has become more competitive. Small cars made up 22% of the auto market when the Renault Alliance was introduced in the 1983 model year (the Renault Encore was introduced a year later). By the 1986 model year, small cars made up only 17% of the industry.

AMC matched GM, Chrysler and Ford in offering buyer incentives, mostly discount-rate financing, begun by GM in August, 1985, to clear out inventories. Incentives, which have run almost continuously since then, cut into profit margins for all the auto makers, but were especially costly to AMC, which has higher borrowing costs.

During the first quarter of 1986, AMC lost $18.9 million, compared with a loss of $29 million in the same quarter the previous year. Higher sales in the Jeep line combined with the company's cost-cutting program accounted for the narrowing of the loss. North American car sales fell 46.8% during the quarter, to 17,011, while Jeep sales were up 11%, to 53,162.

A search for advertising economies resulted in the September, 1985, selection of Saatchi to handle the full AMC account, not just the estimated $50 million the agency had handled for Jeep. Grey's Renault billings were estimated at $60 million. AMC officials acknowledged that the growing importance of Jeep, at least for the short term, influenced the decision, and they indicated Saatchi would become involved in long-term strategy and promotional work.

Earlier in the year, Saatchi had turned its Southfield office into a full-service agency, while Grey had continued to handle creative in New York. Saatchi doubled the size of its Southfield office to nearly 90 by the end of 1985. David Welch, deputy chairman of London-based Saatchi, was appointed president of the Southfield office effective June, 1986.

Saatchi handled the campaign for the fall, 1985, introduction of the Jeep Comanche, Jeep's first entry in the 2 million unit compact pickup market. With Comanche available in either two or four-wheel-drive, it expanded Jeep's coverage of the light-truck segment to 50%, from 16%.

Comanche was pitched at young males as a macho alternative to buying a small car. AMC spent more than $11.5 million in measured media during the last four months of 1985 to introduce Comanche. That included about $6.4 million in network tv and $4.2 million in magazines.

In January, 1986, the last Jeep CJ—the "Civilian Jeep" descended from the World War II workhorse vehicle—rolled off the line at the Jeep assembly plant in Ohio. It was replaced in May with the new Jeep Wrangler (YJ in Canada), which resembled the CJ in silhouette but actually shared more parts with Jeep's sport utility truck, Cherokee.

AMC spent $6 million in a three-month introductory media blitz for the new Wrangler, featured the vehicle on at least 12 prime-time tv shows and ran sweepstakes tie-ins with Coty-Stetson fragrances, Pennzoil, S&H and Hardee's.

AMC tried to attract attention to its sagging Renault car lines by signing in April, 1986, actor George C. Scott to a 14-month, $1 million contract as spokesman for Encore and Alliance.

During the fall of 1985 and early 1986, AMC was a major sponsor of National Basketball Assn. telecasts on cable superstation WTBS and bought time on CBS' NBA broadcasts. Jeep and Renault were the designated official vehicles of the NBA. AMC will spend more than $6 million during the 1986 season on ABC's "Monday Night Football," getting auto exclusivity for a quarter of playing time for each of 12 telecasts.

Another attempt to gain consideration for Renault will be the introduction in the fall of 1986 of the "pocket rocket" Renault GTA model, with a peppier engine and sports-car-like handling. Volkswagen, with its Golf GTI, and Ford, with its Escort GT, are other marketers that try to boost the image of their small cars with a performance version.

AMC, which does not expect to turn a profit in 1986, will try to finally drive into higher-margin territory with a number of new entries beginning in 1987, starting with the Medallion compact in January, followed three months later by the two-seater Alpine, which will compete against cars such as the Porsche 944. Both will be imported from AMC's French partner, Renault.

In the fall of 1987, AMC will introduce the Renault Premier, a midsize sedan designed for the North American market by Italian stylist Giorgio Giugiaro. It will be followed a year later by a coupe version of the car, with both to be built in AMC's new $675 million plant in Bramalea, Ont.

Closer to home, AMC announced in July, 1986, an agreement with Chrysler Corp., the No. 3 U.S. auto maker, in which AMC will assemble large, rear-wheel-drive cars for Chrysler at its Kenosha, Wis., assembly plant beginning in February, 1987.

Regie Nationale des Usines Renault of France owns 46.1% of AMC. With Renault losing $1.5 billion in 1985, the company continued to be under pressure from French union leaders and others to sever its connection with AMC. Those ties seemed to be reaffirmed, however, by personnel moves made by Renault.

In December, 1985, Renault's No. 2 man, Pierre Semerena, was named AMC chairman, succeeding Paul Tippett, who had left the post to become president of Springs Industries, Fort Mill, S.C. Further bonding occurred in January, 1986, when AMC president-ceo Jose Dedeurwaerder was named Renault exec vp in charge of both worldwide sales and marketing and also manufacturing operations outside of France and Belgium. That left Joseph Cappy, who had been promoted in December from exec vp to chief operating officer, in charge of AMC's day-to-day operations.

In March, 1986, Mr. Dedeurwaerder became vice-chairman of AMC, and Mr. Cappy moved to president-ceo.

American Telephone & Telegraph Co. set out to prove it was "The Right Choice" in 1985, its second full year of operations after divestiture.

AT&T puts its advertising costs at $695.9 million worldwide in 1985, down 9%. The reported figure includes all spending for media, research, agency work and salaries. The Ad Age estimate of $521.3 million in the U.S., is down 8.5% frm spending in 1984.

The single largest measured spending cutback was in corporate advertising, falling 42% to $40.9 million in 1985, with network tv, now 55% of the expenditure, dropping off $29 million from 1984 levels. Magazines, representing 24% of the 1985 total, fell by $4.6 million.

AT&T shifted away from corporate identity themes in 1985 after intensive spending in 1984 to establish the AT&T brand name following the breakup of the Bell system Jan. 1, 1984, analysts say. But AT&T's corporate campaign continued 1984 themes, stressing AT&T's commitment to quality, reliability and service in telephones, information and network systems, long-distance service and computers. The ads conclude with the corporate ad theme adopted in April, 1985, "AT&T: The Right Choice."

AT&T's biggest push in 1985 was to persuade residential and business customers to choose AT&T as their primary carrier in the $50 billion long-distance services market, which accounted for 46% of AT&T's 1985 revenues, up 1%. The three-year process of converting local telephone company connections to equal access for all long-distance carriers ends this September. However, nearly 30% of all local connections remain to be converted either because of old equipment or because AT&T does not own a majority share of the local company.

AT&T boosted measured spending for AT&T Communications long-distance service 12.7% to $191.1 million in 1985, using ads featuring actor Cliff Robertson, judged Advertising Age's star presenter for the year. This category alone accounted for nearly 50% of AT&T's total measured media.

Heading the category was $118.7 million in measured media promoting consumer long-distance, accounting for 31% of AT&T's total measured media in 1985 and representing a 5% spending level increase from 1984. Spending was divided 67% network tv, 18% magazine and 8% network radio, 4% spot tv, and 3% other media.

Business long-distance service was targeted with $47 million, up 74% from 1984. Some 62% was in network tv. International long-distance spending grew 126% to $24.9 million, divided into 60% spot tv and 40% magazine.

The advantage AT&T had in gaining equal access connections by default was struck down in June, 1985, by an FCC ruling that customers who fail to select a long-distance carrier would have one assigned for them at random. Previously, those failing to indicate a choice automatically were assigned to AT&T.

Predictably, AT&T's market share in long-distance service fell to 83% in 1985 on approximate revenues of $37.7 billion, from an 85% share in 1984 on revenues of $35 billion, according to the U.S. Telecommunications Market Report, issued by New York-based Northern Business Information. Moving up were the combined operations of Washington-based MCI Communications and Satellite Business Systems, which MCI bought in June, 1985, from IBM.

Market share for the combo increased to 6.6% in 1985, from a share of 5.5% in 1984, on revenues of $3 billion, up 33%.

Kansas City, Mo.-based U.S. Sprint gained slightly to 3% of the market in 1985, up from 2.9% in 1984, on revenues of $1.36 billion, up 13%. However, U.S. Sprint may account for up to 4% of long-distance business, following the July 1, 1986, merger between GTE/Sprint, owned by Stamford, Conn.-based GTE Corp., and U.S. Telecom, owned by United Telecommunications, Kansas City, the No. 3 and No. 5 carriers, respectively. Combined revenues for U.S. Sprint are $1.8 billion. All other long-distance carriers combined represent 4% to 7% of the market, says William Rich, analyst with Northern.

As equal access selection draws to a close, AT&T is changing its advertising focus to stimulating the use of long-distance lines, says Kim Armstrong, ad director for AT&T Communications in Basking Ridge, N.J. In May, 1986, AT&T began airing "Reach out and touch" tv commercials, a campaign that had been shelved two years ago.

AT&T also took aim at lower-priced competitors with $2 billion in rate cuts effective June 1, 1986. If the full reductions are approved by the FCC, prices for direct dialed calls will be 21% lower than on Jan. 1, 1984, when the company shed the seven regional Bell operating companies.

There is no denying that AT&T has been effective in keeping the lion's share of long-distance service, says Glenn Pafumi, first vp-research, Dean Witter Reynolds, New York. "In fact, AT&T may be doing too well and is squeezing out some of the smaller competitors," he says.

Since the early 1980s, long-distance carriers have offered rates 15% to 20% below AT&T's because AT&T was paying higher access charges for better quality connections with regional Bell operating companies (RBOCs), says Gerald Mayfield, president, DMW Group. These access charges can represent up to 20 cents for a minute of long-distance time that costs the consumer 30 cents, Mr. Mayfield says. Although the fees differ with each RBOC, "you're talking about a big savings in gross margins for AT&T's competitors," Mr. Mayfield says.

As the competitors gain better connections through equal access, their costs rise dramatically, Mr. Mayfield says. "Now they'll have better quality service, but their margins are gone." As a consequence, the market is becoming tight.

AT&T in May named James E. Olson to succeed the retiring Charles L. Brown as chairman-ceo and elected Robert E. Allen to replace Mr. Olson as president.

Three new vice-chairmen also were appointed, effective Sept. 1. Randall L. Tobias was named vice-chairman for the newly combined AT&T Information Systems and AT&T Communications long-distance unit. Also named vice-chairmen were Charles Marshall, in charge of external affairs, and Morris Tanenbaum, who oversees financial and strategic planning.

The Sept. 1 combination of Information Systems with AT&T Communications—permitted in a September, 1985, FCC ruling—is designed to help AT&T develop a cohesive strategy in marketing products and services, including long-distance telephone services and computers as part of data networks, rather than as stand-alone machines. Under the new structure, the 92,000 Information Systems employes will be combined with 118,000 AT&T Communications employes in a new organization with four group presidents.

The four presidents and their groups: Sam Willcoxon, Business Markets Group, which will have more than 33,000 employes and account for 50% of AT&T's total revenues and profits; Victor A. Pelson, General Markets Group, with nearly 72,000 employes selling long-distance services and equipment to small businesses and consumers, and servicing equipment for all customers; and W. Frank Blount, who already is in charge of AT&T's long-distance telephone network; and a president yet to-be-named for the Special Markets group, with about 200 employes involved in planning, joint ventures and joint marketing projects.

Analysts are positive about the restructure, given AT&T's success in its core long-distance business, and the prospect that AT&T can improve sales in its troubled Information Systems division.

AT&T still has some soft spots. Sales of personal computers, for example, fell flat in 1985, despite the October, 1985, introduction of its first IBM-compatible, the PC 6300 Plus. JoeAnn Stahel, analyst with Store-Board Inc., Dallas, says AT&T's market share in revenues of the $6.5 billion personal computer market increased to 3.7% in the first six months of 1986 from 2.5% in 1985, but unit sales and revenues crashed in April, 1986. AT&T's share of unit sales for the month dropped to 2.1% and revenues to 1.8% from a steady 5.1% for both in the first quarter, she says.

Convergent Technologies, the San Jose, Cal.-based supplier for AT&T's Information Systems division, reported in May, 1986, that computer shipments to AT&T declined 30% in the second quarter and will fall even more through yearend. Analysts say it is further evidence that AT&T's non-IBM compatible UNIX computer has flopped in the marketplace.

"AT&T isn't doing well in computers, but who is?" says Dean Witter's Mr. Pafumi, who faults AT&T for not acquiring small computer makers to buy market share. "The problem with AT&T is their own pigheadedness that they can do it better by themselves," he says.

Measured media for AT&T computer systems totaled $14.9 million, 92% of which was for network tv, 8% magazine. Introduction of the PC 6300 accounted for an additional $1.6 million in measured media in 1985. Measured spending on computers dropped 24% from 1984.

DMW's Mr. Close says AT&T is making a resurgence in business and consumer products for information movement and management, and it will come on strong in late 1986 and early 1987. Although AT&T was late to market with its central office switch, losing millions in sales to Northern Telecom, the U.S.-based subsidiary of the Canadian telecommunications equipment manufacturer, and AT&T took a beating in the early 1980s on PBX systems, AT&T's new switching systems are selling so well the company recently had backlogs on spare parts.

But even in the market for large switching systems, AT&T is increasingly being challenged. Martin Marietta Corp. in late July formed a coalition with Northern Telecom and the seven RBOCs in a bid to win the $4.5 billion, 10-year Federal Telecommunications System 2000 contract from the federal government. AT&T holds the current contract. The General Services Administration announced in February, 1985, that it was looking for a new system, which provides telecommunications service to 1.3 million federal telephone users in 50 states.

AMR Corp. maintained the same advertising spending levels in 1985 as the previous years while recording substantial improvement in virtually all financial returns, especially from its principal subsidiary, American Airlines.

American Airlines reported revenue passenger miles of 44.1 billion, up 20.3% from the previous year, and a passenger load factor of 64.6%, up 2.0% from 1984. At the same time, American was able to reduce its operating expenses per available seat mile to 7.83 cents from 8.09 cents.

American remained the nation's second largest airline, behind only United Airlines. American's market share hovered around 11.6%, compared with United's 13.6%.

However if Texas Air (No. 7 with about 3.5%) acquires Eastern Air Lines (No. 3 with about 11%) it would drop the parent companies of United and American to No. 2 and No. 3 among airline companies. Texas Air is currently comprised of Continental Airlines and New York Air.

AMR chairman and president Robert L. Crandall attributed 1985's performance to continued efforts to lower the company's costs while maximizing productivity of all AMR units. Figures for 1985 also were affected positively by the swell of traffic that came to American Airlines during a second-quarter strike against United. An indication of that crossover effect was the financial performance of the airline during the second quarter ended June 30, 1986. AMR reported net earnings of $128.2 million on total operating revenues of $1.5 billion for the period, a drop of 26.3% in earnings on revenues that fell 10.1%, compared with the previous year's second quarter.

First-half net earnings were $132.4 million, down 43.5% from the first half of 1985. Total operating revenues in the first half were $2.9 billion, down 3.5% from the comparable 1985 period. Over-all operating income for the first half, though, fell 62.3% to $138.5 million, reflecting continued competitive pressures in the industry.

During the first half, American's available seat miles grew 10.5% over the year-earlier period, but the load factor dropped 1.1 percentage points to 66.1%. Thomas G. Plaskett, American's senior vp-marketing, attributed the decline in traffic to year-to-year comparisons artificially exaggerated by the impact of the strike against United.

According to First Boston Corp., American Airlines was one of only two airlines to make a net income gain the first quarter of 1986 (Continental was the other), and American and Western Airlines were the only two carriers reporting a first-quarter operating profit.

AMR Corp., in January, 1986, sold its Flagship International Inc. subsidiary, which operates the Sky Chefs foodservice unit, to Onex Capital Corp., Toronto. Terms were not disclosed. Also, the company, in June, 1986, sold its AMR Energy Corp. subsidiary to a wholly owned subsidiary of Total Petroleum Ltd. Terms of that transaction were not disclosed.

On Jan. 1, 1986, AMR formed American Airlines Direct Marketing Corp. as a subsidiary of the airline. The new unit was projected to have 1986 revenues of about $50 million derived from the company's telemarketing and direct mail operations. Divisions within the subsidiary include American Airlines Telemarketing Services and American Traveler Merchandising. The latter publishes American's inflight catalog and is developing other direct mail programs.

AMR formed AMR Information Services Corp. in April, 1986, to oversee the company's expansion and acquisitions in the information processing field. The heart of the new subsidiary is the company's SABRE computer system. The new subsidiary signed a five-year contract in July, 1986, to provide a computerized reservations system for Dallas-based Southwest Airlines and its subsidiary, TranStar Airlines, beginning in the fall.

AA Magazine Publications, a newly organized unit of American Airlines, shifted responsibility for ad sales of American Way inflight magazine to a new in-house sales organization (as of Sept. 21, 1986). Previously, ad sales were handled by Communications International. The new publishing division in March began publication of Private Clubs, a 200,000-circulation magazine for members of the nearly 200 private clubs operated by Club Corporation of America.

During 1985, American Airlines introduced an ad campaign targeted to business travelers whose business comprises the bulk of American's revenues. Creative was by Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt/Southwest, Dallas.

After the campaign broke in the fall of 1985, 15.4% of consumers, when asked to name the first airline advertising to come to mind from the previous month, named American's ads. The campaign led Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey in October, 1985.

American added new print ads and tv spots in July, 1986, extending the emotionally oriented business campaign.

American, in October, 1985, named Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York, to handle its estimated $2 million-plus international account previously at TBWA, New York, and Woodyer, Hudson & Chapman, London.

The airline in early 1985 extended membership in its AAdvantage frequent-flier program to senior citizens through the Senior Savers Club. Membership offers a 10% discount on any American fare, plus additional benefits.

Direct marketing for AAdvantage, formerly handled in-house, was assigned to Young & Rubicam's Wunderman, Ricotta & Kline subsidiary, New York.

While AMR was diversifying to boost productivity and profits in 1985 and 1986, the company announced three new hubs—Nashville, Raleigh/Durham and San Juan—to add more than 20 cities to American's route system and as many as 346 daily departures. American continued its expansion at Dallas-Fort Worth Airport and at Chicago's O'Hare. The Nashville hub opened in 1986; the Raleigh/Durham and San Juan hubs are set to open in 1987.

American Eagle, the franchise arrangement between American and certain commuter airlines, completed its first year during 1985 with five carriers operating 482 daily departures to more than 53 destinations. Three additional carriers were set to join the American Eagle network by mid-1986.

American's SABRE computerized reservations system assumed a new role with introduction of a program for linking the system to home computers. Telemarketing activities, stemming from the availability of SABRE computer time, contributed $29 million in revenues in 1985, $4.7 million more than in the previous year.

To sustain the announced route expansion, American purchased 23 McDonnell Douglas Super 80s in 1985. Subsequently, American exercised options on 20 more of the aircraft. The airline took delivery of five new Boeing 767s and refurbished 120 existing aircraft.

Perspectives from an ANA director

A speakers bureau could be beneficial

Kim McIver Armstrong, director of Long Distance and International Advertising for AT&T Communications, says she has observed more emphasis by the Assn. of National Advertisers on business-to-business advertising. She also believes the association has a more active voice in general on advertising issues. She recommends that an ANA speakers bureau be formed.

Ms. Armstrong, who is a member of the ANA executive committee and the advertising management standing committee, says, "Traditionally, ANA had the reputation of a consumer organization. In recent years, an effort has been made to put greater emphasis on business-to-business advertising. I think we have made wonderful progress and will continue to.

"One important goal of the group is to be an active voice on behalf of the advertiser point of view. We act as a source, a network on evolving issues .... With the pressures advertisers are feeling today, we must draw on every source we have. We are concerned with maintaining the quality of seminars and workshops. We are very interested in taking an active role in matters of legislation on behalf of client-advertisers."

On the issue of more companies bringing media-buying in-house, Ms. Armstrong says, "While we don't contemplate such a move here at AT&T, from the ANA standpoint, I think it [ANA] can act as a catalyst to introspection and can assemble case histories and offer information on the pitfalls and benefits [for those contemplating such a move]."

She says that while the ANA plays an important educational and informational role, "One thing we have not done that might be helpful is to have a speakers bureau. Around the country, people with experience could be made available."

Kim McIver Armstrong
AT&T Communications

In terms of the increased diversion of traditional media dollars into nonmedia promotions, co-ops and trade deals, the Michigan State University graduate says, "I think the pressures on advertising as a result of changing business conditions are causing us to take different kinds of risks. The days are long over that threw advertising dollars at a problem to solve it. There are lots of implications. I think advertisers are looking for ways to do things more efficiently and effectively. We're all scrambling."

She says she has noted the increased segmentation of marketing and regional targeting.

"It's certainly true in my field. Overall, we are not doing things the same way we once did. We are using nontraditional approaches. In earlier times, pressures were not as severe on profits. There was more time to experiment. Now the pressures on businesses are causing a shorter rollout time."

Ms. Armstrong is volunteer coordinator of the Advertising Council campaign on Understanding Mental Illness and serves on the Board of Directors of the Ad Council and the International Advertising Assn. Also, she is a member of the advisory board for the Children's Express, the national children's news organization.

strategies and agency assignments for several existing products.

Beer and beer-related products continue to account for more than two-thirds of A-B's sales, reporting net sales of $5.412 billion in 1985, or 77% of consolidated net sales of $7 billion. A-B barrelage sales increased 6.3% to 68 million bbls. in 1985 from 64 million the previous year, while the domestic brewing industry as a whole was up less than 1%.

With beer consumption flat, A-B's barrelage growth has come primarily at the expense of competitors. The company estimates it accounted for 36.6% of domestic beer sales in 1985, a gain of two percentage points over its 1984 share, and has set a corporate goal of attaining a 40% share by the end of the decade. No one in the brewing industry is inclined to bet against its achieving that mark. A-B's closest rival, Milwaukee-based Miller Brewing Co. unit of Philip Morris, reported sales of 37 million bbls., down from 37.5 million in 1984. Miller's second-ranking market share remained at about 20%.

New-product introductions and expansion into nonbeer categories helped buoy A-B's over-all sales, but the company also worked to ensure that its core brands maintained or improved their sales levels.

Few single products are as important to any multibrand giant as Budweiser is to A-B. More than 45 million bbls. of Budweiser were sold in 1985, making it more than just the largest-selling U.S. beer. Bud accounted for two-thirds of A-B's beer production and about one-fourth of the domestic beer market. Bud's sales are almost equal to the barrelage sales of No. 2 brand Miller Lite, No. 3 Miller High Life, No. 4 Coors and No. 8 Coors Light.

A-B has been unwilling to tinker too dramatically with its marketing strategy for Budweiser, but has fine tuned a positioning that has worked well. In a reworking of its advertising's tradition of "saluting" the nation's work force, Budweiser's ad theme was changed to "You make America work, and this Bud's for you" from "For all you do, this Bud's for you." That may seem a minor change, but for a brand as successful as Budweiser, any changes become significant.

Measured-media advertising and promotional spending for Budweiser topped $80 million in 1985, maintaining the brand's distinction as the most heavily advertised beer in the U.S. Bud also accounted for 25% of total A-B measured advertising of $315.3 million.

The bulk of Budweiser tv advertising time continues to be bought during sporting events. To that end, the brewer in 1985 signed a new five-year sponsorship agreement with sports cable network ESPN. A-B spent $16.4 million on cable tv advertising in 1985, much of it on ESPN.

One of A-B's more innovative buys came during the 1986 World Cup soccer championship that NBC broadcast live from Mexico. Recognizing that play rarely is stopped during a soccer match, A-B arranged for the Budweiser logo and label to frame the tv picture for 30-second periods rather than break away from the action. A-B reportedly is seeking similar sponsorships during other sports broadcasts.

Bud Light, introduced as Budweiser Light in 1981, continued to show strong sales growth, increasing to an estimated 5 million bbls. in 1985 from 4.2 million the previous year. That increase came despite a nearly 15% reduction in measured ad spending for the brand from $56 million in 1984 to $47.7 million.

Bud Light has been helped by the over-all growth of the light-beer segment and by the popularity of the "Gimme a light . . . No, Bud Light" campaign from Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago. Initially planned as a short-term campaign to boost on-premise bar calls for the brand, the campaign now has become the brand's signature.

Michelob, A-B's second-best seller, did not fare as well as Bud in 1985, and the brewer has made more substantial marketing changes. Michelob barrelage dropped nearly 5% to an estimated 6 million bbls. from 6.3 million in 1984. That sales slide has continued since the brand peaked at 7.5 million bbls. in 1981, and it mirrors the declining share of the U.S. beer market held by superpremium (priced above premiums such as Budweiser) brands. Sales of Michelob and other superpremiums have been hurt by the rising popularity of imported beers. Michelob Light, however, has managed to keep its sales steady at about 2.5 million bbls. for the past few years.

In July, 1984, A-B had split the Michelob/Michelob Light advertising assignment, previously consolidated at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis. Michelob and Michelob Classic Dark (put into national distribution in 1985) were given to Ted Bates Advertising/New York; Michelob Light went to Needham, Chicago. Bates' campaign, themed "Where you're going it's Michelob" and unabashedly targeting young, upwardly mobile men and women, immediately was assailed by many in the ad community as the "ultimate yuppie appeal." Worse, it failed to slow erosion of Michelob's sales.

In November, 1985, A-B once again began reviewing the account. All three parts of the account were reunited at a single agency—Needham—in June, 1986. Needham's initial creative, which it presented during the review, uses the theme "The night belongs to Michelob" and the music and voice of British singer Phil Collins.

Measured-media spending for the superpremium line was $38 million for Michelob (up slightly from $35.5 million in 1984); $25 million for Michelob Light, and $3.9 million for Michelob Dark (compared with only $325,000 the previous year).

A-B's popular-price brands, Busch and Natural Light, continued to provide strong backup support for Budweiser and Bud Light and continued to grow. Busch especially strengthened its position, with sales rising 15% to an estimated 5.3 million bbls. from 4.6 million in 1984, putting it among the top 10 domestic brands.

While A-B has worked hard to promote Bud Light as an on-premise brand, Natural Light continues to be positioned as the choice for at-home consumption. Natural Light barrelage was about 1.7 million bbls. in 1985, up slightly from 1984's estimated 1.6 million.

Low-alcohol beers continue to draw limited interest from the beer-drinking public, but A-B has not given up on its entry, L.A. A-B shocked the brewing industry by spending $23.7 million on introductory advertising for the brand in 1984. Last year that budget was reduced to $17.2 million, still a high figure for a brand with sales analysts' estimate at only 400,000 bbls. The apparent strategy is to ensure that L.A. maintains its status as the leading domestic low-alcohol brand should that category ever catch on.

To oversee purchase of national broadcast media time for all Anheuser-Busch brands, the company in November, 1985, formed a new subsidiary, the Busch Media Group. It handles network tv and network radio buying, an assignment previously handled by national agency of record DMB&B, which retains responsibility for buying all local radio, local broadcast sports sponsorships, corporate print, stadium signage and outdoor advertising.

That subsidiary's role will gain in importance as A-B expands nationally with the various new products in its brand stable. In addition to Michelob Classic Dark beer, the brewer in 1985 also moved its King Cobra malt liquor into national distribution.

King Cobra represents A-B's return to the malt liquor category, which it left in the late 1970s after the failure of Budweiser Malt Liquor. Advertising for King Cobra is handled by the J.P. Martin agency, a black-owned shop in New York. Measured-media spending in 1985 was about $1 million.

Two other areas—snack foods and wine—in which A-B has maintained a low-profile interest for several years moved more outfront in 1985. The Eagle Snacks line, begun as a tavern complement to A-B beers, began to move into national distribution. Eagle honey roasted nuts became the first to receive network tv support. In total, A-B spent $3.9 million in measured-media advertising for the line and has begun test-marketing the snacks in Canada and Japan.

Over the past two years, A-B has been expanding distribution of its Master Cellar wines, which it sells only in taverns. By mid-1986, the line was available in 38 states in all areas of the country.

A-B also has become a serious player in the wine cooler market. Its first entry was Baybry's champagne cooler, a champagne-based beverage introduced into West Coast test markets in November, 1985.

The product's sales have been disappointing, and it has not been expanded to additional markets. Company officials admit that Baybry's higher price —about $5.50 for a four-bottle pack— has hindered trial.

A second entry may meet with more success. Dewey Stevens Premium Light, introduced in June, 1986, is wine based like most other coolers and carries a competitive price.

As a point of difference, Dewey Stevens is being promoted as having one-third fewer calories than other major brands (it also has less alcohol, although that difference is not being highlighted). A-B expected to have the product in all major markets by summer's end.

Responsibility for wines and wine coolers has been given to a new operating unit, Anheuser-Busch Beverage Group, which now directs marketing for all beverages other than beers.

That also includes bottled water, a market in which A-B is determined to become a major factor. In November, 1985, the brewer acquired Saratoga Springs, N.Y.-based Saratoga Springs Co., which sells bottled mineral water on the East Coast. Four months later, A-B moved to the other coast, buying Santa Rosa, Cal.-based Sanie Mineral Waters. Ad responsibility for both brands was given to Bloom Agency, Dallas, which also handles both cooler products.

A-B also hired San Francisco-based agency Hal Riney & Partners away from G. Heileman Brewing Co. to handle new products and corporate advertising.

Being the nation's largest beer producer is not enough. A-B also wants to become a major beer importer. Its first import deal, signed in late 1985, brought it U.S. rights for Danish Carlsberg beer and Elephant malt liquor, and the company is believed to be seeking additional import agreements.

A-B also has focused corporate attention on rejuvenating Campbell Taggart, the Dallas-based diversified food-products company it acquired in 1982. Net sales for the company's food-products division, of which CT is the largest part, were $1.416 billion in 1985, up 5.4% from 1984.

New products were added in CT's bakery division, which accounted for 72% of the subsidiary's sales. These included the Family Recipes bread line, the Sandwich Croissant line (under the regional Rainbo, Colonial and Kilpatrick's labels), Brown and Serve French bread (under the International Hearth and Earth Grains labels) and Roman Meal Light breads.

CT last year reintroduced a reformulated line of frozen Mexican foods under its El Charrito brand, comprising 25 different items.

Measured-media spending for brands in the food-products division was $1.3 million for the Earth Grains line, $1.7 million for El Charrito, $750,000 for Rainbo bakery items and $224,000 for the Grant's Farm line.

A new element in the diversified-operations division was Seattle-based Exploration Cruise Lines, acquired by Busch Entertainment Corp. in 1985.

BEC's theme parks reported increased revenues for 1985. Attendance at Busch Gardens (The Old Country) in Williamsburg, Va., was up 4.5% to 2.05 million. The number of visitors to Busch Gardens (The Dark Continent) in Tampa, Fla., was up slightly at 2.9 million. At the Sesame Place children's park outside Philadelphia, attendance rose 2.1%.

An attendance record of 2.6 million (300,000 above the previous high) was set by A-B-owned St. Louis Cardinals National Baseball Club, which represented the National League in the 1985 World Series. It was defeated four games to three by cross-state rival Kansas City Royals.

A-B defends advertising

A ban on broadcast advertising of beer and wine proposed by some groups before Congress drew this response from Anheuser-Busch: A ban stigmatizes the product, implying even responsible use is somehow wrong; no scientific evidence links advertising with abuse; ad bans in others countries have not discouraged abuse; the brewing industry has seen per capita consumption actually decrease since 1981 despite increased ad outlays.

Apple Computer, which experienced its most difficult year in 1985, has shifted its focus from high-profile marketing programs to internal reorganization, but while Apple cut back its advertising expenditures for the year, management is expected to step up the marketing effort in the second half of 1986.

Turmoil within the company began during the summer as it reorganized in an effort to offset the first loss in its corporate history. A power struggle evolved between co-founder and chairman Steven P. Jobs and president-ceo John Sculley, ending with Mr. Jobs leaving to found a new company, while Apple followed him with a lawsuit. Under Mr. Sculley, Apple cut some 1,500 people from its payroll and closed three manufacturing plants.

After the dust settled, Apple entered the current fiscal year with its most profitable quarter ever. Sales, however, slipped as the company searched for a new comprehensive marketing strategy for its Macintosh computer system.

Analysts see Apple maturing as it enters its second decade. Those associated with the "old Apple" sometimes refer to the current management as caretakers; Wall Street sees the once high-flying company as more responsible.

On the marketing front, the biggest change occurred last May, when, after a four-month review, Apple fired Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, and awarded its $50 million domestic account to BBDO, San Francisco/New York.

The move caught few people by surprise, and certainly not many within Chiat. Mr. Sculley's ties to the international powerhouse, now part of Omnicom, date to his tenure as president of Pepsi-Cola USA. BBDO successfully won almost all of Apple's international accounts, with the exception of Canada (handled by Scali, McCabe, Sloves) and Australia (Crystal Palace).

However, the account won by BBDO is just a shadow of the business Chiat once held. Apple hit its advertising peak in 1984. Beginning with its hit "1984" commercial on Super Bowl XVIII, Apple went on to spend an estimated $100 million advertising that year. With management concentrating on its profit margins, total ad spending dropped to about $65 million. For Apple's current fiscal year, the ad budget stands at just $38 million.

Apple's 1985 annual report included a series of fictitious interoffice memos, many dealing with Mr. Sculley's cost-cutting objectives. One memo addressed Apple's new-found ad objectives: "Reduce expensive network television advertising; increase less expensive and more targeted advertising, such as radio and local newspaper; support dealer advertising aimed at increasing store traffic."

Beginning the fourth quarter of last year, Apple shifted its advertising approach dramatically, moving from image-oriented programs to more direct campaigns designed to help sales on the retail level. For example, Apple marketing execs cited the company's high level of consumer awareness in its decision to pass up ad time during Super Bowl XX.

The effect of Mr. Sculley's belt-tightening measures became apparent in the beginning of its current fiscal year. For the first two quarters of fiscal 1986, Apple's sales fell 17% to $942.8 million from $1.13 billion in the comparable period a year earlier. Gross profit margins, however, improved from 40% to 53%, with net income of $88.7 million for the first six months of fiscal 1986 exceeding total profits in fiscal 1985.

Apple's improved margins, which should remain stable, now are taking a back seat to the company's efforts to perk up sales in a crowded industry. Unlike the marketers competing in the IBM arena, Apple has been able to protect itself from the "clones" by guarding its proprietary operating system. On the other hand, market leader International Business Machines is suffering from competition both from name brands, such as Compaq and Leading Edge, as well as from the so-called no-names, imported from the Far East and priced as low as $695.

Mr. Sculley addressed Apple's slipping sales last April in his quarterly meeting with Wall Street financial analysts. At that time, he said the company would increase its spending in marketing, sales and product development, but these efforts wouldn't begin to pay off until 1987.

Apple's ad spending should increase in the second half of the calendar year. The company has said it will introduce more new products in 1986 than in any other year in Apple's history. And new introductions are expensive. Apple's big ad spending jump in 1984, for example, was tied to the rollout of two machines: Macintosh and Apple IIc.

Apple is keeping tight security on its new product developments, even to the point of hiring a private investigation company to plug leaks from outside developers. Apple often shares its products under development with these independent companies to ensure that various hardware add-on products and software will be available soon after it introduces a new product. Despite strongly worded nondisclosure agreements between Apple and these third parties, word of impending new introductions is rarely withheld from the trade and general press.

Products expected to be introduced in the remainder of this year include a new machine in the Apple II family and a new Macintosh. The new Apple II unit is reportedly code-named SG, for sound and graphics, two capabilities both Atari and Commodore push heavily.

Within the Macintosh line, Apple has promised to release an "open" Mac, or a machine that a user can customize. IBM embraced the open system concept from its start in the personal computer business, but Apple resisted the move. Mr. Jobs is credited with the desire to keep customers out of the Mac's insides, preferring to offer more of an appliance that comes complete in the box.

Apple reached another milestone in 1986 when, for the first time, the Mac outsold the Apple II line. Long Apple's cash cow, the II line now is viewed as nearing obsolescence, although the huge library of software available for the machine continues to spur sales. The Apple II, offered as both the IIe and the newer IIc, remains strong in the home and education markets.

Growth in the computer industry, however, centers in the business arena and most major contenders are vying for a piece of that pie. Apple is no exception. Apple, though, no longer competes head-to-head against IBM by offering "the computer for the rest of us." Instead, it promotes the power of the machine as well as the ease with which novices can become proficient on the Mac.

But the Macintosh suffered from the lack of a cohesive marketing strategy for almost six months. Following the January, 1985, introduction of the Mac, Apple began a campaign using the theme "The Macintosh Office" to promote its strongest contender in the business marketplace. The concept failed, and Apple pulled the campaign just as it began its retrenchment. "The concept was fine," says advertising and sales promotion manager Bruce Mowery, "but there was a fundamental flaw: We didn't have the products in place to support the selling proposition."

The hottest new segment of the business market is personal computer-based publishing, called desktop publishing. Apple pioneered this concept of producing typeset quality documents with its Mac when it introduced the LaserWriter Plus and the Macintosh Plus in January, 1986. The LaserWriter, which in itself is the most powerful computer Apple markets, connected to the Mac potentially can save a company many times its price by eliminating outside printing costs.

Industry analysts are almost unanimously bullish about the future of desktop publishing, with some predicting that segment growing to $3.5 billion by 1990.

Also in an effort to limit some of the debilitating discounting of its computers, Apple cut 600 stores from its 2,600 outlet roster. Included in the cuts were 103 Sears Business Systems outlets. Apple said the stores it eliminated as authorized dealers contributed 10% of sales.

Apple also got backing from the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco for a clause in its dealer contracts that prohibits the dealer from selling by mail order. The intent of the clause was to promote only one-on-one selling and the service that implied. Several dealers had sued Apple in 1981 over the clause. The ruling underscored Apple's contention that a manufacturer has control over the distribution of its products. Any further appeals on the case would have to be heard by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Apple's direct support to its dealers reached a new high in its current fiscal year, mostly in the area of direct response advertising. Observers estimate Apple doubled its budget for direct response advertising to $10 million in the current fiscal year.

Its first major foray into direct mail occurred in late 1984 when it shipped 7.5 million pieces to potential Apple II customers, offering an instant credit line of $2,500. For the following year, Apple doubled the number to 15 million pieces.

In the educational segment, Apple mailed a promotion to 1.8 million teachers and professors last March. While in the business market, Apple is sending out an elaborate promotion (estimated to cost more than $1 per piece) to more than a million businesses. For the first half of 1986, Apple has launched at least 15 programs.

Krupp-Taylor, Marina del Rey, Cal., handles Apple's direct response advertising. Introduced to Apple by Chiat/Day in 1982, Krupp retained the account even after Apple shifted its domestic account to BBDO. Krupp recognizes the possible threat from BBDO, with its subsidiary BBDO/Direct, which is sure to attempt to woo that part of the business.

In measured media advertising, which dropped 38% to $52.3 million, the biggest dollar cut appeared in tv advertising, with network buys totalling $25.9 million compared with the 1984 total of $42.8 million. Apple's magazine ad expenditures suffered the biggest percentage drop, down 44% to $11.9 million from $21.5 million in 1984, when it was the sole sponsor of Newsweek's election-week special edition in the first week of November, 1984.

By product line, Apple's emphasis shifted away from the Macintosh, with the majority of spending centering on the Apple II line. Measured expenditures for the II totaled $24.5 million, down 16% from 1984, while spending on the Mac registered $11.2 million, down 69% from $35.9 million the previous year, according to LNA.

Of the money spent to promote the Mac, Apple devoted almost 80%, or $8.9 million, to network tv, while magazine expenditures totaled $2.3 million. In the same two categories a year earlier, Apple spent $22.7 million and $10.9 million, respectively.

For the total 1985 U.S. microcomputer market, valued at $13.32 billion, Apple ranks second with 10.7%, down from 13.8% a year earlier, according to International Data Corp., Framingham, Mass. At the same time, market leader IBM expanded its share to 34.3%, compared with 28% in 1984. Other major players in the market, and their shares, include: Compaq, 5.9%; Hewlett-Packard, 4.7%; AT&T, 4%; Commodore, 3.2%; Tandy, 2.5%; Zenith, 2.3%; Wang, 2.3%, and Atari, 2.1%. All other competitors have less than a 2% share.

Apple lost share again in the much-coveted business segment of the market, valued at $8.79 billion in 1985, up 5.6% from the previous year. Apple now ranks fourth with a 4.4% share, down from 9% in 1984 and 19% in 1983.

Leader IBM maintained its 40% share in 1985, despite strong competition from the "clone" marketers. Also ahead of Apple in the business arena are Compaq with 8.4% of the market, and AT&T with 5.5%. The other major players, and their shares, are: Hewlett-Packard, 3.5%; Wang, 3.2%; Zenith, 2.8%, and Convergent Technologies, 2.0%.

Apple continues to dominate the educational market where it holds a commanding 54% share, well ahead of second-ranked Tandy's 23% share and IBM's 12%. In the home and hobbyist market, Apple ranks second with 21.4% of the market, behind market leader Commodore, which holds a 37.3% share.

Batus Inc. announced in January that it would sell six of its retailing businesses, including New York-based Gimbels Department Stores, or 40% of its U.S. retail business. By mid-July, agreements had been reached on the sale of 77 of 93 stores.

The divestiture is a result of low profits and incremental growth in recent years. Operating income from retailing rose only 2% in 1985 over the previous year, and only 0.9% in 1984 over 1983. As a result of the discontinued retail operations, Batus, the U.S. subsidiary of London-based B.A.T Industries plc, took a $150 million loss while recording $164 million in net income in 1985, a 47.8% decrease from 1984.

Batus decreased the amount it spent on magazine advertising in 1985 by about $13 million. However, it increased its spending on outdoor advertising by about $10 million, and slightly increased spending on newspaper and spot radio, to bring its total measured advertising outlays in line with 1984.

The largest share of Batus' advertising budget is allocated to its tobacco group, Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., which received $52.8 million in measured advertising for its tobacco products last year, down 10%, according to Leading National Advertisers. The expenditure counted for 54% of total measured ad spending at Batus.

B&W's share of the total domestic cigaret market increased in 1985 from 11.3% to 11.8%, due mostly to its 26.4% share of the popular price-value market. B&W is in second place in this segment of the market, behind leader GrandMet's Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., Louisville, and slightly ahead of RJR/Nabisco.

With the introduction in 1985 of its Richland brand, B&W entered the value-for-money segment of the tobacco industry. Richland was B&W's first new product introduction since 1981. Richland offers smokers 25 cigarets for the same price as regular 20 packs. B&W spent more than $12.5 million on measured advertising for Richland in 1985, second only to its flagship brand, Kool.

The company scored a marketing coup in 1985 when it reached an agreement with Generic Products Co., Fort Worth, Tex., to make its GPC-approved cigarets. Richland and the generic labels were the major factors contributing to B&W's over-all share increase.

Although B&W's share of the total market increased in 1985—one of only three companies to post gains—the increase was not aided by the performance of B&W's full-priced brands. B&W's flagship, Kool, the fourth largest selling cigaret brand in the U.S., achieved a 6.7% market share last year, compared with a 7% share in 1984. The company increased measured spending 11.5% to $29 million to advertise the Kool line, mostly in magazines and outdoor advertising. Kool King Size 25s and Kool Milds 25s also were introduced in selected markets during 1985.

B&W's ultra-low tar cigaret, Barclay, which has less than 1% of the market, continued its market decline in 1985. As a result, B&W began testing a reformulated Barclay. Although the company says it hopes the new Barclay will be a success, it cut ad spending for the cigaret in half last year, to only $4.4 million.

The tobacco company overhauled its advertising agency lineup early this year, much as it did in 1984. B&W dropped Doyle Dane Bernbach as its agency for Kool and assigned creative responsibilities to Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, which already handled media buying and planning for all B&W brands, including Kool.

In restructuring its retail operations, Batus hoped to concentrate on stores it believed had the greatest potential for growth and profitability. Saks Fifth Avenue, which B.A.T bought from the Gimbel family in 1973, saw increased operating income last year of 7% on sales that increased 6%.

Analysts say Saks has rebounded from a period when it failed to keep up with its major competitors in pricing and fashion. Saks opened a new store in San Antonio, Tex., in 1985 and opened replacement stores in Southampton, N.Y., and Palm Springs, Cal. The store also is renovating and modernizing its facilities. Batus spent nearly $1.5 million on measured advertising for Saks in 1985, down 35% from 1984.

Batus' Marshall Field's stores saw an improvement in sales of 8% and in operating profits of 6%. Measured ad spending remained relatively unchanged at $2.3 million. Marshall Field's is the major retailer in the Chicago area, where most of its 21 stores are located. Analysts say that until Batus bought Field's in 1982, the store had failed to compete with specialty stores that had entered the Chicago market.

Batus set out to modernize its facilities and seek professional management, tasks that analysts say have been completed and are the key to the store's new success.

Batus is also retaining its Ivey's stores, in the Carolinas and Florida; its Breuners stores in Arizona, California and Nevada, and its Thimbles stores in the Midwest and the Northeast.

Batus' three Crescent stores, all in Spokane, Wash., and its 15 Frederick & Nelson stores, in Washington and Oregon, have been sold to a group of investors in Seattle. They will continue to operate as retail stores under their present names. Additionally, Batus' 39 Kohl's stores, all in the Midwest, have been sold and will continue to be operated as they are.

Of Gimbels' nine Midwest stores, five have been transfered to Marshall Field's. Batus is discussing the sale of the other four with possible buyers, according to a Batus spokesman. In Pittsburgh, four have been sold to May Department Stores and negotiations with buyers are under way for three units. Ten Gimbels stores in the East have been sold to Allied Stores Corp. and one to Associated Dry Goods. Eight others, including Gimbels' New York flagship, still are being negotiated.

Also as a part of Batus' retail restructuring, it announced that its chairman and chief executive, Arnold Aronson, would resign after a transition period. Also leaving would be M. Ronald Ruskin, Batus retail president.

Bayer AG continued to fuel U.S. subsidiary, Miles Laboratories, with ad spending in support of Miles' leading brand Alka-Seltzer, which moved into the cardiovascular market after the Food & Drug Administration ruled that aspirin, a major ingredient in Alka-Seltzer, was a preventative for heart attacks.

Bayer also obtained limited use of its name as a brand name stateside following an agreement reached with Sterling Drug Co. allowing it to buy back partial rights to the Bayer trademark for $25 million. Sterling, New York, has held the rights to the Bayer name since World War I.

Although Sterling will continue to market its aspirin product under the Bayer name and symbol in North America, Bayer gained the right to use the name on industrial products and chemicals, as well as to bestow the name on its newly formed holding company in the U.S.

The holding company, Bayer USA, formed July 1, 1986, and based in Pittsburgh, encompasses Bayer's U.S. subsidiaries: Miles Laboratories, Mobay Corp., Agfa-Gevaert Inc. (which includes Compugraphic Corp.), Helena Chemical Co. and Haarman & Reimer Corp., and Deerfield Urethane. Konrad M. Weis is the president-ceo of Bayer USA. He previously served as chairman, ceo and president of Mobay.

Bayer's U.S. division contributed 23% of total sales of Bayer AG, or $4 billion, in accounting for the single largest regional contribution to corporate totals. Mobay contributed the most with sales of $1.6 billion, followed by Miles and its subsidiaries—$1.18 billion in sales, one-third of them from outside the U.S. Dollar conversions in this profile were made at the rate of $1=DM2.91 for 1985 and $1=DM2.79 for 1984.

Miles Laboratories, the Elkhart, Ind., subsidiary, is made up of six operating groups: Pharmaceutical, diagnostic products, hospital products, biotechnology products, consumer healthcare and household products. The latter two categories accounted for the major portion of Miles' ad expenditures.

The consumer healthcare sector is home to Miles' largest selling single product, Alka-Seltzer, which received nearly $20 million in measured media support, the highest of any consumer product line. On the market since 1931, Alka-Seltzer received professional labeling from the FDA decision made in October. The next month, Miles began promoting Alka-Seltzer to physicians for the new indication.

A new consumer campaign by McCann-Erickson, New York, bearing the theme line "Alka-Seltzer to the rescue" was introduced in November.

Alka-Seltzer Original was joined in November by a lemon-lime Flavored Alka-Seltzer line extension. Promoted as "A better tasting way to help you feel better," the Flavored Alka-Seltzer alternative seeks younger users and those who dislike the taste of the original product.

Bypassing the test market stage, Flavored Alka-Seltzer began national distribution after extensive consumer-panel testing. A four-tablet direct mail sampling program supplemented the advertising effort. After less than two months on the market, the flavored version of Alka-Seltzer recorded a 0.2% share of the antacid market in drugstores, according to Joseph Candrevo, special projects coordinator for Pipeline Research, which measures sales by manufacturers to drugstores. In addition to drugstores, Alka-Seltzer is heavily marketed in grocery and discount stores.

Two other Miles products appear in the $700-$800 million antacid category—Alka-Mints and Alka-Seltzer Gold, a nonaspirin product. Alka-Mints, which replaced the discontinued Alka-2, received $6 million in measured spending. With five products in the same category, Miles' presence accounts for a 7% over-all share of the antacid market, where over-all sales are considered to be flat.

The Alka-Seltzer franchise extends beyond antacids into the $1.1 billion cold-cough remedy segment, with its Alka-Seltzer Plus cold product. Alka-Seltzer Plus, the fastest-growing Miles product for the second year in a row, garnered a 6% share of the highly competitive category, backed by $12 million in ad spending. The category is led by Burroughs Wellcome's Actifed and Sudafed, whose combined share is 27.5%, and Richardson-Vicks' (Procter & Gamble) Nyquil, which holds a 10.9% share. The total Alka-Seltzer inventory of products received $37.4 million in advertising allotment.

Miles introduced in the second quarter of 1985 a multivitamin called Within, a reformulation of One-A-Day with Iron, to which calcium and extra iron have been added. Miles backed the introduction with nearly $5 million in ad spending. Within garnered a 3.2% share of sales to drugstores.

A sugar-free version of Bugs Bunny vitamins generated a 23% sales increase in its first full year on the market. A sugar-free version of Flintstones vitamins was introduced in the fourth quarter. The Miles children's vitamin duo leads the $80 million children's vitamin category. Both products received $7 million in advertising.

Biocal, Miles' entry in the calcium supplement market, recorded a 3.7% share, in a category dominated by Marion Laboratories' Os-Cal, which holds a 61.2% share to Biocal's 3.7% share, according to Mr. Candrevo. Biocal did not receive any measurable advertising support.

In Miles' household products segment, Glass Works was introduced in the $175 million U.S. glass cleaner market currently dominated by Drackett Co.'s Windex, which, after about 40 years on the market, holds a 58% share, and Texize's Glass-Plus product, which debuted in 1975. Glass Works, unlike its competitors, contains a vinegar-based formula, compared with the ammonia formulation of other brands. Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York, introduced the product in a comparative ad campaign in April, 1986.

Capitalizing on consumer familiarity with another Miles product, S.O.S cleaning pads, the S.O.S name has been flagged on Glass Works' packaging. Bypassing test-marketing, Glass Works went into national distribution after consumer-test panel reviews. Cents-off coupons in free-standing newspaper inserts and on S.O.S cleaning pads packaging supported the introduction of the product.

S.O.S cleaning pads, which dominate the scouring pad market in the U.S. and Canada, continued to increase market share in 1985, aided by a 30-pad box introduction for heavy consumption buyers. S.O.S oven cleaning pads maintained a market share of 7% to 8% in the $60 million oven-cleaning category. However, Miles strategy in the division focuses on new product development because scouring is on the decline as convenience items like microwave ovens and ceramic cookware proliferate.

Perspectives from an ANA director

Activity in Washington is a great asset

As chairman of the board of directors of the Assn. of National Advertisers, Herbert M. Baum, president of the U.S. division of Campbell Soup Co., says he has five major concerns:

- Development of a pro-active stance in Washington
- Resolution of membership eligibility and dues structure
- Improvement in advertising education programs
- Active involvement in the international advertising arena
- An increase in membership.

Mr. Baum, who is chair of the ANA membership committee and the executive committee and a member of the finance committee, says the Washington office of the ANA has become more important in recent times.

"We have become a more valuable asset because of our efforts on behalf of the First Amendment. We rallied to what the Washington office has been doing and we mobilized Washington representatives and major advertisers to work hard on every issue [that affects us], like the tax reform and disallowance proposals."

Mr. Baum lauds the work of the ANA committee that reworked the dues structure "to make us more effective." Also, he says he wants the association to continue to be an educational resource for members.

On the international scene, Mr. Baum notes that the entire ANA board attended the World Federation of Advertising meeting this year and new members may come from a global outreach.

Regarding other advertising trends, including the effect of agency megamergers and the potential for account conflicts, Mr. Baum says, "I'm kind of outspoken on this. I think what agencies do is their own business as long as it doesn't affect our business where there is a specific conflict. The individual parties have to work it out."

He gives the example of what happened at Campbell when Doyle Dane Bernbach and Needham Harper merged.

"One had Weight Watchers and the other Mrs. Paul's, considered to be competitors. Someone came to me and said we had to change agencies because of the conflict, and I said, 'Let Heinz change agencies.' It turns out those accounts weren't so competitive, after all. I take a liberal point of view, but other members of the ANA are vehemently opposed to [agency] linkups even if they're only across town."

Herbert M. Baum
Campbell Soup Co.

On the issue of the increased diversion of traditional media dollars into nonmedia promotions, for instance, Mr. Baum calls it the "beginning of the end for brand marketing."

"Promotion to me means incentives, coupons, lower costs. Media advertising is meant to build brands, meant to sell product attributes."

On the issue of shorter rollouts in new product development tests, Mr. Baum says, "There are two choices: To turn out very small laboratory-type tests so that the competition doesn't find out or to just go national. We do a lot with BehaviorScan, and we find that the competition rather than consumers ends up buying most of our test products."

Mr. Baum joined Campbell in 1978 as associate director of new products in the canned food division. After five months, he was promoted to director of marketing services and was subsequently elected corporate vp-marketing. Before joining Campbell, he was vp-account supervisor at Needham Harper & Steers and previously worked for Doyle Dane Bernbach and Stern, Walters & Simmons agencies.

Miles' pharmaceuticals division outpaced all other product groups, aided by a new product introduction in the first quarter of 1985. Mycelex G-500 mg, a single-dose prescription vaginal tablet to treat candidiasis, or yeast infection, encourages greater patient compliance than traditional three, seven or 14-day treatments.

Late in 1985, Miles received FDA approval to market its first cardiovascular product, Adalat (nifedipine). Adalat, used in the treatment of angina pectoris, is Miles' first compound in a new class of calcium antagonists, which were discovered by parent company Bayer AG. Until the end of 1985, nifedipine had been marketed under an exclusive license to Pfizer Inc., New York, in the U.S., whose brand name for the product is Procardia. It has been Pfizer's second largest selling prescription drug, with $219 million in sales in the U.S. last year. But when Pfizer's license expired at the end of last year, the way was paved for Miles to enter the category in January.

Adalat is the first of several cardiovascular products Miles hopes to market. The rest are either in the clinical stage or under review by the FDA.

Among restructuring moves, Miles Scientific has merged with the Ames Division to form the Diagnostics Group. More recently, Hospital Products was merged with Miles Pharmaceuticals into a unit that is called the Biological Division. The Bayvet animal healthcare division was transfered to another Bayer subsidiary, Mobay Corp., at the end of the year.

The Biotechnology Group acquired Biolac Inc., of Logan, Utah, for its Marschall Products division. Biolac manufactures and markets a pH control system, cultures and culture media for cheese makers. Agfa-Gevaert, Teterboro, N.J., another Bayer subsidiary that markets photographic films, magnetic tapes and tapes and videocassettes, had measured advertising totaling $314,300 last year.

Beatrice Cos. has come full circle since 1984 when then-chairman James Dutt bought Esmark Inc. after a battle of wills with Esmark chairman Don Kelly. Last year marked the return of Don Kelly and the dismantling of Mr. Dutt's plan to make Beatrice the "premier worldwide marketer of food and consumer products."

In November, Mr. Kelly, backed by New York investment house Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts & Co. (under the name BCI Holdings Corp.), led a leveraged buyout of Beatrice. The sale of Beatrice units to reduce corporate debt, begun under Mr. Dutt's reign, continues under Mr. Kelly, the latest being the $1 billion sale of Beatrice's personal products division. The division, including Playtex products, Jhirmack haircare and Almay cosmetics, was sold in early August, 1986, to a group of investors including Joel E. Smilow, chairman and president of International Playtex.

The sale of the personal products division will go a long way in reducing the $6.4 billion debt incurred by BCI Holdings in its takeover of Beatrice last year.

Beatrice earned $232 million from continuing operations, down 51.6%, on sales of $11.4 billion, down 3.9%. For first-quarter 1987, the company reported $2.3 billion in sales, up 4.5% from the same period in 1986. Operating earnings fell 12% to $116 million, mostly because of divested businesses.

Before the second takeover in late 1985, Mr. Dutt continued his attempts to reduce the company's debt from the Esmark acquisition by selling its bakery operations, a home respiratory therapy company, and its foodservice equipment, agri-products and leather operations for a total of about $300 million.

International Playtex sold its Orlane cosmetics unit and Beatrice's STP automotive products company went to Union Carbide, Danbury, Conn., for another $87 million.

After Mr. Dutt's resignation on Aug. 3, 1985, new chairman William Granger stepped up divestiture plans to reduce the overwhelming interest payments on Beatrice's $3 billion debt at the time. No longer did the company target units that didn't fit into the strict definition of "food and consumer products."

Placed on the auction block in late 1985 were the Avis rental car unit, Danskin fashions, Pennaco hosiery and International Jensen car stereo. If those units could be sold, Beatrice's debt-to-capital ratio would be 45%, down from 70% right after the Esmark acquisition. (Eventually, Avis, Danskin and Pennaco were sold but only after KKR took over Beatrice.)

The debt reduction plan, however, placed Beatrice in the path of another peril: The company became a prime takeover target. Enter Don Kelly and KKR, who closed their $6.2 billion buyout of Beatrice on April 17, 1986. Reductionism was prime on their minds as well.

Under Mr. Kelly's tutelage, Beatrice has dumped its Coca-Cola Bottling operations for $1 billion; sold its International Playtex unit for another $1 billion, and begun considering a plan to offer a public stock offering of its International Foods operation.

Falling interest rates also have been a boon to Mr. Kelly's goal of paying the bankers that helped finance his Beatrice buyout and getting the company's operations back in gear after Mr. Dutt's erratic reign.

At the end of Mr. Dutt's tenure as head of Beatrice, 39 of the company's 59 top executives had either been fired or forced to resign, leaving the company without any clear line of management succession and without seasoned marketers at the helm. The last executive to walk away from Beatrice just before Mr. Dutt's firing was William Reidy, senior vp-director of corporate strategy, chief architect of the company's plan to become a worldwide marketing powerhouse. (Mr. Reidy rejoined Beatrice in his former post once Mr. Dutt had left.)

Not surprisingly though, one of Mr. Kelly's major priorities is house cleaning. To date, several key executives have left and have been replaced by people loyal to Mr. Kelly. He also promises a 10% reduction in Beatrice's total work force by yearend 1986, including 300 of the 500 people employed in the corporate offices and at U.S. Foods.

One of Mr. Kelly's biggest reductions came in April when he eliminated the entire corporate and U.S. Foods marketing staff, estimated at 100 people, and the corporate communications staff, estimated at 26 people.

Among top management, the first to leave were David Lipson, cfo; Frank Grzelecki, president-consumer products, and Anthony Luiso, president of U.S. Foods. Mr. Lipson was replaced by Roger Briggs, Mr. Kelly's partner at Esmark, while Mr. Luiso was replaced by Frederick Rentschler, who headed Esmark's Swift/Hunt-Wesson grocery group. Mr. Grzelecki was replaced by Mr. Smilow who became president of Playtex in 1969 and chairman when Beatrice bought out Playtex parent, Esmark, in 1984. He was made head of the consumer products division by Beatrice, but resigned and became part of an investor group that took Beatrice private.

Joining Beatrice from the outside were Edward Gustafson and John Grant, two Miles Laboratories execs who will act as middlemen between Mr. Rentschler and the food unit's day-to-day operations.

As for Beatrice's over-all corporate marketing vehicles, Mr. Kelly has scrapped the company's $30 million "We're Beatrice" corporate name awareness campaign via HCM, Chicago. He also has halted Mr. Dutt's $70 million investment in Formula I and Indy automobile racing. With the same brush stroke, Mr. Kelly eliminated Beatrice's Special Events divisions, but the company will remain a sponsor of America's Marathon/Chicago. Beatrice management also reduced agency commissions for media buying and other agency services to 8% from 12.5%, agency sources say.

The Esmark acquisition brought Beatrice the Hunt-Wesson nationwide distribution system—the perfect channel to move its various regional brands into national distribution. While many of the nongrocery lines are strong financial performers, as a group they have proved too unwieldy to run profitably.

Mr. Dutt's plans left Beatrice with one strong unit—U.S. Foods.

Each segment of the grocery unit—dairy, grocery and meats—has a strong, national distribution system which is one of the keys to success in the food business.

Last year, Beatrice began moving its County Line cheese out of its midwestern markets and into major cities like Boston, Los Angeles, New York and San Francisco. Measured ad spending jumped 127% to $5 million to back the effort.

La Choy canned Chinese food products had its ad spending boosted 508% to $8 million last year in an effort to gain additional distribution.

Swift Meats' advertising grew by 27% to $15 million last year on the strength of two new Butterball products. Beatrice has been trying to expand the brand name out of its niche as a whole turkey producer and into turkey parts and lunch meats.

Last year, Butterball added Breast of Turkey in barbecue and hickory smoked varieties. The company also began testing in Florida a 21-item line of turkey-based cold cuts. The product was so successful in test, Beatrice wanted to roll it into national distribution, but was held back by product difficulties, a Beatrice spokesman says. Grey Advertising, New York, handles.

Other Beatrice food products which received added advertising support in 1985 were Orville Redenbacher popcorn, up 16% to $11.8 million; Fisher Nut, up 20% to $6.5 million, and Wesson oil products, up 89% to $19 million.

Those food products whose measured ad spending dropped include Swiss Miss, down 54% to $5.3 million; Eckrich meats, down 54% to $4.5 million; Tropicana juice products, down 27% to $9 million; Hunt's tomato products, down 8.5% to $16.2 million, and Martha White bake mixes, down 13% to $800,800.

The sale of the personal products division also is expected to loosen several products from the new owners to lessen their debt.

In fact, it was reported at the time of the sale of the division that Revlon Group was buying Max Factor, Almay and Halston cosmetics for a reported $375 million.

During the year, International Playtex added a new tampon to its line, Playtex Plus Deodorant Tampons, and boosted its measured ad budget 95% to $8.2 million. The brand holds a 33% share of the $1 billion category.

Ad spending for the Almay line of cosmetics more than doubled to $17.3 million to back its new skincare line. Jhirmack added 40% to its ad budget, bringing it to $12.3 million to back two new shampoo and conditioner varieties. Samsonite's ad budget grew 18% to $3.2 million behind a new tv campaign touting the product's durability.

Spending for Culligan drinking water remained flat at slightly more than $4 million, but should increase in 1986 behind the test of home bottled water in central Florida, which began in May.

Playtex intimate wear spending also was unchanged at $15 million despite the introduction of Right for Me bras for smaller breasted women. International Playtex ad spending fell for several products, including Danskin (down 68% to $258,500). Avis spending was down 7% to $11.2 million.

Measured ad spending also fell for Max Factor, down 7% to $9 million; Halston perfumes, down 92% to $2.3 million and Halston sportswear, down 35% to $55,800.

Most of the shifts in Beatrice ad spending can be attributed to the sale of some of its subsidiaries, calling for a different media mix among the remaining brands. The most dramatic shifts: Newspapers fell 93% to $8.8 million; network cable spending was down 55% to $2.3 million; spot radio spending zoomed up 308% to $12.2 million, and network radio rose 63% to $5.5 million. Network tv spending was flat at $111.6 million.

Major agency changes at Beatrice include:

- Fisher Nut (an account worth $4 million) to J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, from Leo Burnett Co., Chicago.
- Swiss Miss cocoa and puddings ($3 million) to JWT from Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Minneapolis.
- County Line cheese ($5 million) to BJKE from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago.
- Tropicana orange juice ($15 million) to Burnett from DMB&B, New York.
- Burrell Advertising, Chicago, appointed its first agency for black-oriented advertising.
- International Playtex consolidated its international advertising efforts at Grey Advertising, New York, previously split between Grey and Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide.

Beecham Group plc, seeking more dynamism in the front office and its product lines, took remedial steps during fiscal 1986 by replacing its chairman and chief executive and purchasing Norcliff Thayer, U.S. marketer of Tums, Oxy, Avail and No Salt.

Lord Keith of Castleacre, an outside director and vice-chairman, was moved into the top spot in November, 1985, replacing Sir Ronald Halstead, who had held the post since 1984. The move was cited by analysts as an attempt to bring dynamism to the company from the top down. Beecham, although showing relatively good sales and earnings performances per annum (it ended 1986 with sales up 13.7% and profit up 4.3% in pound sterling), has been slow to both react to and introduce new products within its product categories.

Then in January, 1986, Beecham continued its method of U.S. growth through acquisition. It purchased Norcliff Thayer, Tarrytown, N.Y., from Pantry Pride's Revlon Inc. for $395 million.

Industry analysts estimate Norcliff Thayer's annual sales at about $165 million.

The company joined Beecham's stable of independent U.S. operating companies that includes Beecham Consumer Products, Pittsburgh; Beecham Cosmetics, Chicago; Germaine Monteil Cosmetiques, New York; Beecham Home Improvement Products, Dayton, O., and Beecham Laboratories, Bristol, Tenn.

Sales from these units along with operations in Canada, Mexico and South America contribute $1 billion, or 38.7% of Beecham's worldwide sales total in 1986. Operating profits in the Americas declined by 19.4% to $104.3 million during the fiscal year, partially because of the effects of the strong dollar.

Beecham financial figures for the Americas were translated into U.S. dollars at the rate of $1.2648=£1 for both 1985 and 1986 fiscal years.

Beecham Consumer Products division was busy defending its Aqua-Fresh toothpaste in the $1 billion market segment, in which most of the players lost market share to Procter & Gamble's Crest because of P&G's highly successful introduction of tartar-control Crest formula.

Aqua-Fresh has seen its share gradually erode from 12% in 1984 to 11.5% in early 1986. Aqua-Fresh made apparent moves to reposition itself by extending its line to include a two-color Aqua-Fresh for children flavor. Through 1985, measured advertising for the toothpaste increased by 12.3%, to $25.8 million, according to Leading National Advertisers.

In comparison, Crest showed an estimated $90 million in total market spending for its line.

Spending increased 47% on Massengil products, a line the company says holds a 50% share of its feminine hygiene segment. Spending increased for Sominex 2 sleeping aid, which drew $5.1 million in measured spending, up 23%, and Vivarin stimulant tablets, which got $2.5 million, up 48%.

Beecham also heavily promoted its cough and cold remedies. Through calendar 1985, measured spending increased for N'Ice sugarless lozenges, up 34% to $2.3 million and Children's Sucrets, up to $1.4 million from only $680,000 in 1984. Adult Sucrets drew $4.2 million, virtually even with the previous year.

Other big spenders in the Beecham Consumer line include Cling Free fabric softener, down 23% to $5.2 million; Geritol, down 6.7% to $8.5 million; Aqua Velva aftershave, down 11% to $4.2 million, and Calgon bath products, down 63% to $2.9 million.

Beecham Consumer Products had several new rollouts in 1985. A mousse formula of Brylcreem was supported with a network tv spot reviving the "A little dab'll do ya" slogan. The company also introduced Delicare, a fine-fabric liquid laundry detergent, with tv spots positioning it directly against Boyle-Midway's Woolite.

Spending for Beecham Cosmetic's Jovan line of fragrances for men and women increased by 28.4% over 1984 to $4.8 million. Jovan musk oil for men drew the largest individual total of $1.4 million. The Yardley line declined to $47,600 from more than $295,000 in measured advertising in 1984. Vitabath products drew $233,100 in spending during 1985.

Beecham plans to introduce a number of new products by fall, 1986. These include an Adidas fragrance and self-care products for men, Vitabath Plus body care products, Jovan shower and bath cleansing gel, and Gambler cologne musk. The Tuvache product line, transferred from Monteil to Beecham, was relaunched in 1986.

A $1.1 million spending push was given to the Titiana fragrance under the Diane Von Furstenberg line of Germaine Monteil. The Lancaster treatment line, also carried by Monteil, drew measured spending of only $95,900.

"It hasn't been a very good year for Jovan. The entire middle range [of fragrance] had it tough with sagging consumer support," says Allan Mottus, a health and beauty products industry consultant and publisher of "The Informationalist" newsletter. He says the Vitabath line has done well, however. Mr. Mottus estimates Beecham pulls about 3% of the $7.7 billion women's cosmetic, fragrance and treatment market.

"The U.S. operation of Germaine Monteil is not doing very well, and Beecham has let the trade know it would like to sell it. I think Beecham would like to get out of the department stores altogether, and the sale of Monteil would tie into that," Mr. Mottus says.

His assessment of the most recent Beecham acquisition, Norcliff Thayer, is more favorable: "Even though it was an expensive purchase, it has turned out to be a good one." Operations of Norcliff Thayer were included under Beecham Group beginning Jan. 1, 1986. Its line of health aids and over-the-counter products includes Tums antacid, Oxy acne medications, Avail multivitamins for women and No Salt.

Spending on Tums, the antacid market leader, was measured at $9.4 million in 1985, up 28.8%. A Tums campaign, positioning it as an economical source of calcium for women, also won it a share of the calcium supplement market, a company spokesman says. Oxy products were supported with about $1.1 million in 1985 measured spending, down from about $4.2 million; Avail drew $1 million (no expenditures were recorded for Avail in 1984 by LNA), and No Salt, $1.3 million, up from $601,000.

Beecham Home Improvement Products, a marketer of caulks, sealants, preservatives and adhesives, budgeted an estimated $2 million in advertising for calendar 1985. It utilized some of its budget through the sponsorship of "Do-It-Yourself Moments," a syndicated package of one-minute tv featurettes on home improvements that feature DAP and Weldwood products. DAP previously had underwritten the "Do-It-Yourself Show," a weekly half-hour series on the Public Broadcasting Service.

B-M underwrites tv programs

Bristol-Myers is entering the tv sitcom business for the 1987-88 season, paying $10 million in production costs to Group W Tv Station Group for a half-hour sitcom and several one-hour public service health specials to run on Group W stations. B-M, forking out $250,000 per health special and $9 million for the sitcom, is seeking similar arrangements with other producers.

Bristol-Myers kept advertising expenditures in 1985 slightly ahead of 1984 levels as it experienced low sales in its consumer groups. Now, sales are on the upswing, despite a setback in mid-June, 1986, when the company withdrew all Extra-Strength Excedrin capsules from the market after tampering incident that led to two deaths.

Over-all, corporate advertising and promotional expenses rose to $775.8 million worldwide in 1985, up 4.3%, an increase that represents less than half the compound annual rate from 1981 to 1984, according to Salomon Brothers, New York. Of the total, promotional dollars rose substantially by 6.8% to $519.5 million in 1985, while total ad expenditures declined 0.4% to $256.3 million.

Salomon Brothers analyst Patricia Lea attributes the over-all contraction in spending to low consumer sales growth last year. But consumer sales are reviving in 1986, and ad spending is expected to grow, Ms. Lea says. B-M's consumer product sales should grow 3.4% this year compared with 1.5% last year, she predicts.

Bristol-Myers faced a major scare in mid-June when two deaths were reported in the Seattle area caused by cyanide poisoning traced to Extra-Strength Excedrin capsules. B-M ordered a nationwide withdrawal of Excedrin capsules. Later the same week it halted the sale of capsule forms of its Datril and Bufferin pain relievers and Comtrex cold products and moved to end its capsule lines at a cost of $38 million.

As a result of product tampering and measures taken by B-M, its second-quarter net income dropped 4% from the previous year to $119.3 million because of a $19 million (after-tax) charge. Sales were up 8.5% to $1.17 billion over the year-earlier period. Earnings advanced 7% to $263.9 million for the first six months of its current fiscal year on sales of $2.36 billion, up 9%.

In its pharmaceutical division, B-M last October bought Genetics Systems Corp., a biotechnology company based in Seattle. It paid about $300 million in stock. B-M also launched BuSpar, a major new anti-anxiety drug, overseas in preparation for entry into the U.S. this year. Both could contribute as much as $600 million in additional revenue by the end of the decade, representing the company's fastest propects for growth. Genetic Systems should bolster B-M's already dominant position in chemotherapy and other anti-cancer drugs.

Advertising and promotion was heavily weighted toward B-M's consumer products group last year, especially in support of Clairol, Nuprin, Excedrin, Bufferin and Ban.

Clairol launched Ultress hair coloring gel with $6.4 million in tv and magazine backing, according to Leading National Advertisers, which covers seven media. Despite the new product introduction, Clairol products posted an 8.4% decline in measured media spending to $41 million as the group recorded an over-all flat sales performance in 1985. But it maintained its dominance in the domestic hair coloring market, with a 65% share, down slightly from 67% in 1984. Clairol advertising continued to decrease (from nearly 40% of total company ad expenditures in 1981 to about 30% in 1985) and apparently influenced an agency consolidation; longtime agency Foote, Cone & Belding was dropped while key assignments were moved to three other top Clairol agencies, Doyle Dane Bernbach; Laurence, Charles, Free & Lawson, and Grey Advertising.

Despite Clairol's dominance, the division has felt pressure as L'Oreal continues to grow. Cosmair's line of L'Oreal products has grown to a 27% market share with Preference and Avantage. Vidal Sasson is also a growing competitor.

According to Salomon Brothers' estimates, Nice 'N Easy has experienced a declining market share, from 31% in 1981 to 25% in 1985. Loving Care, Clairol's second most important brand, also has slipped slightly to a 12% share of market last year.

Ultress gave Clairol a boost as the new product grabbed about 5% of the total Clairol hair coloring sales in 1985. Ultress' total share of market, according to Salomon Brothers, grew from 1.2% in 1984 to 12.5% last year. Hair coloring products account for one-half of Clairol's revenues.

Ban Solid deodorant and antiperspirant bowed with about $10 million in measured media weight to bring total spending for the Ban line to $15 million, up 49%. The company's total deodorant sales rose 11% last year, much of this growth attributable to Ban Solid. Other contributors are Ban (regular) and Tickle. Total share of the deodorant market has declined from a high of 12.7% in 1981 to 9.3% in 1985, according to Salomon Brothers. The division also was outspent by Gillette (Dry Idea, Right Guard), Mennen (Speed Stick) and Procter & Gamble

In Tampa we burn the midday oil all week long

Your prospects are bright and affluent in Florida's number one market in terms of population, households and effective buying income. After burning the midday oil in offices throughout the Bay area during the week, they burn the midday oil all weekend long - at the beaches, on golf courses, on tennis courts, in their boats or by their swimming pools.

Tampa's busy consumers depend on buying information found in The Tampa Tribune. When you place your ad in the Tribune, you reach more 25-54 year old readers, more readers in top level occupations, more new car buyers, home computer owners and more households with $50,000+ incomes than you would reach with any other newspaper combination in the market.

For a wealth of detailed market information, call Joe Gess, Tampa Tribune General Advertising Manager, at (813) 272-7447, or your nearest Sawyer-Ferguson-Walker office. It will be an enlightening experience.

Sleep and Secret). Mennen dominates this $1 billion category.

Westwood Pharmaceuticals, the Buffalo-based Bristol-Myers subsidiary, continued its successful assault on the consumer market with Keri Lotion, a skin cream introduced to the professional market in 1983. Keri sales grew 9% to $32 million, or about one-third of Westwood's total revenues. Keri ranks second in the market with an 8% share to Chesebrough-Pond's Vaseline Intensive Care's 20% share.

The Drackett Co., another B-M subsidiary, introduced Lemon Windex in 1985, but its Endust and Behold furniture cleaners and waxes ran up against a stronger S.C. Johnson & Sons, which introduced Duster Plus to the furniture dusting market. Drackett, with a 20% share of the $250 million-plus furniture polish and wax category, already trailed market leader S.C. Johnson, maker of top-selling Pledge, by a margin of nearly 20 percentage points.

B-M and American Home Products continued to battle for market share in the analgesic market in the shadow of dominant Johnson & Johnson, maker of Tylenol. B-M's acetaminophen-based product, Datril, continued to lag AHP's Anacin-3 into the first quarter of 1986. According to Salomon figures, Anacin had a 4% market share while Datril trailed with 1.2%. The product has declined slightly in share since 1984. J&J leads with a 34% share of market. Datril also trails Sterling Drug's Panadol, which had a 3.1% share during the same period.

By the end of 1985, B-M still led AHP by a slight margin in the over-all analgesic market with a 16.5% share. However, in the first quarter, AHP bounded ahead to a 19% share (B-M declined to 16.4%) mainly on the growing popularity of Advil, its ibuprofen entry. B-M's ibuprofen Nuprin had only a 2% share by the end of 1985 to Advil's 5%.

Nuprin's lag came despite a substantial increase in media weight in 1985 to $28.4 million, up 20%. Advil had $35 million in backing, up 43%. Analysts expect both products to undergo substantial marketing changes this fall. Johnson & Johnson, Upjohn and AHP each will introduce more ibuprofen products. Nevertheless, analysts expect the growing popularity of ibuprofen-based products in general to benefit Nuprin. "[Nuprin revenues [should] rebound to around $40 million in 1986, reflecting increased advertising spending and a more competitive voice share," according to Salomon's Ms. Lau. Over-all, B-M's analgesic group is expected to better 1985's sales growth of 2% to 3%.

Bristol-Myers's Excedrin ad spending dropped 4% to $14.5 million, according to LNA, while Bufferin advertising grew 17.7% to $11.4 million. B-M's aspirin product, Excedrin, while briefly hurt by the June recall, had been undergoing a market-share erosion. The family of products had an 8.1% share in 1985 to Anacin's 8% (Excedrin also leads B-M's Bufferin and Sterling's Bayer.) However, the product has suffered a decline since 1982.

B-M expected to halt its four-year market plummet in cold remedies with the introduction this year of Comtrex allergy product. Comtrex cold remedy, B-M's only significant product in the over-the-counter cold remedy market, had a 5% share last year. Measured ad spending of $9.8 million was up 10.1%.

B-M plans the stateside introduction of Buspar at the end of the year following a poor showing for the nonaddictive, nonsedating, anti-anxiety drug in West Germany, its sole market to date. Buspar, to be produced by B-M pharmaceutical subsidiary, Mead Johnson, will take on the dominant drug of the benzodiazepine family, Valium.

Some analysts originally expected Buspar to generate as much as $300 million in 1990, but a poor reception in West Germany—only $3 million in sales in 1985—has led Salomon Brothers and others to cut back revenue estimates to $150 million by the end of the decade. The drug lacks the quick action that Valium and other antidepressants offer, according to Salomon.

The purchase of Genetic Systems Corp. last October should give B-M a strong boost in expertise in monoclonal antibodies, which identify and battle cancerous cells. B-M is the leading producer of cancer chemotherapeutics in the U.S. with about $175 million in sales, but the company faces strong competition from "generic" producers of such drugs. Also, the company's brands lose their proprietary protection in 1988.

Brown-Forman Inc. is hoping its foray into wine coolers through its purchase of Stockton, Cal.-based California Cooler Inc. will heat up sales that are sagging because of a continued drop in consumption of its alcoholic beverage products.

Brown-Forman, which gets 75% of its revenue from wine and spirits, continues to suffer declines in case depletions of its Canadian whiskys and bourbon, and in 1985, it experienced a drop in sales of its Bolla and Cella Italian wines. The primary reasons for the increased sales and earnings during the fiscal year are higher prices and the surging wine cooler business.

California Cooler wine and fruit drink accounted for $11.7 million of the company's seven-media measured spending in 1985, representing 23% of total outlays. Spending was divided 48% network tv, 46% spot tv, 3% cable and 3% other media. Advertising carried the theme "The Real Stuff," emphasizing it was the original cooler and is made with real fruit.

B-F paid $98 million in cash upfront for California Cooler and over the next two years will make payments contingent on case sales volume. Based on current projections, the net cost of these payments could total $44 million, the company says.

California Cooler pioneered the wine cooler category in 1981 and dominated it early on. But the brand steadily has lost market share even as its case sales exploded from a mere 700 in 1981 to about 12 million in 1985. In that period, the retail market for coolers of all types blossomed to about $850 million in 1985 and is projected to approach $1.4 billion in 1986, according to Impact, a wine and spirits industry newsletter.

But even as California Cooler's fortunes soared, the brand lost its leading market share early this year to Bartles & Jaymes, a brand introduced early in 1985 by E&J Gallo Winery, the world's largest wine maker. Gallo supported the Bartles & Jaymes brand heavily, spending a measured $17.2 million in 1985, some 75% on network tv and the remainder on spot tv.

There still is room for growth in the wine cooler market, according to Impact, which estimates volume will grow to 72.4 million 9-liter cases in 1986, up from 42.9 million cases in 1985. These estimates include Bartles & Jaymes capturing 22%, or 16 million cases, in 1986, up from 7.5 million in 1985. Impact projects California Cooler will rank No. 2 with an 18% share in 1986 on sales of 13 million cases, up from 11.5 million cases in 1985. Canandaigua Wine Co.'s Sun Country brand is projected to rank No. 3 with a 13% share on 1986 sales of 9.5 million cases, up from 5 million cases in 1984. Next is Stroh Brewery's White Mountain with projected sales of 9 million cases in 1986, up from 3.2 million in 1985. There are more than 100 cooler-type products.

It will be another year before the California Cooler acquisition will have an effect on B-F income, according to W.L. Lyons Brown Jr., chairman-ceo, pointing out that fiscal 1987 will be the first year of ownership during the all-important spring and summer months.

But where wine coolers have the potential to add revenue, they also are expected to take some away, Brown-Forman says. Research indicates wine coolers tend to attract consumers who would otherwise drink beer or soft drinks, but they also draw against consumption of table wines.

Case depletions for Bolla and Cella, Brown-Forman's leading table wines, were down for the fiscal year ended April 30, 1986. Bolla fell to 1.47 million 9-liter cases in fiscal 1985, down 13%. Cella fell to 2.36 million cases for the year, down 14%. The company attributes part of the declines to an April, 1986, report that Italian bulk table wines were tainted with methyl alcohol, although no contaminated wine reached the U.S.

Brown-Forman spent $5 million in calendar 1985 on measured media for Bolla, unchanged from 1984, divided 48% network tv, 42% spot tv and 10% magazine. Cella received $1.9 million in measured spot tv, down 23% from 1984.

Sales of Korbel champagne jumped 13% in fiscal 1985 to 1 million cases. Korbel spending jumped 24% in 1985 to $1.9 million, almost entirely in magazines.

Brown-Forman's revenues for the fiscal year were $1.3 billion, up 7% from 1984. Net income was $86.4 million, up 6%. First-quarter net income for the period ended June 30, 1986, was $18 million, down 2%, on revenues of $333 million, up 19%.

Revenues from wine and spirits for fiscal 1986 rose 7%, generating operating income of $168.1 million, up 0.8%. Total operating income at B-F was $190.1 million, up 1%. The category increase was mainly because of the California Cooler acquisition and to higher prices primed by a 19% federal excise tax increase taking effect Oct. 1, 1985. The excise tax caused retail prices on spirits to rise 10% on average however, consumers bought heavily before the effective date for the tax. Sales tapered off after Oct. 1.

Brown-Forman, which markets Canadian Mist, the nation's No. 1 Canadian whisky, and Jack Daniel's whisky, the No. 2 bourbon, increased measured spending for both products in calendar 1985.

Canadian Mist received $5 million in measured media, up 3% from 1984 and divided 61% magazine and 39% out-of-home media. The brand leads he declining Canadian whisky category with 1985 sales of 3.6 million ases, down 5.5%, according to Steve . Barsby Associates. National Distillrs' Windsor Supreme brand ranks No. 2 with 3.2 million cases sold in 985, down 1.6%, and Seagram's V.O. anks No. 3 with 1985 sales of 3 milon cases, down 5.5%.

For the first time in several years, Canadian whisky's share of sales for he total distilled spirits industry fell, ropping to 13.2% in 1985 from 13.6% 1984, according to Jobson's Liquor Handbook 1986. Canadian whisky ver-all volume dropped 4.5% in 1985 n sales of 20.2 million cases.

Jack Daniel's whisky received $6.1 illion in measured media in 1985, up %, retaining its title as the biggest ender among bourbons. Media was ivided 75% magazine and 25% out-home. Jack Daniel's is the No. 2 ourbon with sales of 3.1 million cases 1985, down 9.5%, according to Jobon's. No. 1 is James B. Beam's Jim eam brand with 1985 sales of 3.6 milon cases, down 2%.

Whisky/bourbon consumption has een on a downward spiral for more an a decade, falling from 23.6 milon cases in 1976 to 19.2 million in 984. Sales fell another 8% in 1985 to 7.6 million cases, and the category's are of total distilled spirits sales ipped to 11.5% in 1985 from 12.3% 1984.

Despite declining sales for the catery, Jack Daniel's, Jim Beam and eagram's 7-Crown consistently reain among Jobson's top six best-sellg brands for all distilled spirits. What is says, according to the magazine, is at the public is not for or against the tegory, it is for or against specific rands. Jobson's says the category is pe for new approaches to brand marting. One bright spot was international sales of Jack Daniel's and Southern Comfort, another Brown-Forman brand, which neared sales of 1 million cases in fiscal 1986, up about 20% for each brand.

Brown-Forman's other product offerings include Lenox china and crystal products, a company acquired in 1983 and supported with $9.9 million in measured media in calendar 1985, up 66% from 1984. The Lenox division spending was divided 55% newspaper supplement and 45% magazine.

Operating income from these and other home furnishings increased 21.2% in fiscal 1986 to $20.6 million. Operating income from personal use products, such as diamond jewelry and Hartmann luggage, was down 8.8% to $13.2 million in fiscal 1986.

Answering its president's call to make 1986 the "Year of Soup," Campbell Soup Co., since August, 1985, has been involved in an aggressive program of new product rollouts aimed at boosting its 65% market share of the estimated $2 billion prepared soup market.

Campbell, which increased its measured media spending by 2.2% from calendar year 1984 in part to back the soups, through the first nine months of its current fiscal year recorded a 6% increase in unit volume for soups over the corresponding period the prior year. Strong contributors were its new entries—Campbell's Dry Soup Quality and Recipe Mix, Creamy Natural soups, Home Cookin' soups and the new Nacho Cheese Soup/Dip. Soups also shared in a greater marketing largess for the nine months: Over-all marketing and sales expenses increased 10%.

Soups, which traditionally account for one-fourth of Campbell's sales, helped generate for the nine months net earnings of $262.4 million, up 10%, on net sales of $2.09 billion, up 6%. This follows a fiscal 1985 performance in which soup unit volume was up only 1%. Campbell's final quarter and year-end results from the fiscal year ended Aug. 3, have not come in, however, company president, ceo R. Gordon McGovern, has reported net earnings for the company will be about $220 million, up 11%.

Campbell holds an estimated 85% of the canned soup market, which has not experienced as much growth as the dry soup category in recent years. It has been competitors like Progresso chipping away at the Campbell share that has launched Campbell into its soup offensive.

Campbell has created new lines of canned soups and offered line extensions to provide more "premium" items. Golden Label Creamy Natural Soups were rolled out nationally in July, 1985. Six varieties of Campbell's Home Cookin' soup marked a new Campbell entry into the $490 million ready-to-serve soup category.

A new ingredient soup, Nacho Cheese Soup/Dip, was introduced as an addition to the company's cheddar cheese soup and cream of mushroom soup. Prompted by the success of its Chunky New England clam chowder, the company extended its Chunky line with two new varieties.

Ad spending for Campbell canned soup topped $41 million for calendar 1985, as measured by Leading National Advertisers. The largest spending line, next to Campbell's red-label stalwart, was Chunky soup with $7.6 million, up 42.5% from 1984. New products also were supported with direct mail coupon campaigns.

In September, 1985, Campbell launched its first major entries into the dry soup category, a $430 million category dominated by Thomas J. Lipton Inc., with 28% of total dollar sales. The rollout of Campbell's Quality Soup and Recipe Mixes, offered in six varieties, was supported with $4.2 million in measured spending divided between magazines and tv.

Campbell also is testing other soup formulations to cater to contemporary tastes and life styles. Soup du Jour, a line of frozen, premium soups in microwavable-only bowls, is being tested in the Northwest. The six "restaurant-inspired" soups ranging from cream of asparagus to seafood supreme costs between $1.19 and $2.19, depending on the exotic quality.

Another microwavable line, Cookbook Classics, is being tested in Philadelphia.

The company also is experimenting with the popularity of alternatives to expensive metal cans. In December, it began testing Campbell's Homestyle cream of tomato soup in a paperboard, foil and polyethylene carton. The ready-to-serve soup in single serving carton is carried on the grocery shelf.

V-8, Campbell's tomato-based juice, was offered in a 64-oz. refrigerated carton in 1985. Measured ad spending on V-8 declined by 57% for 1985 to slightly more than $3 million.

A line of refrigerated salads was introduced in the Philadelphia area and Southwest states under the Fresh Chef label. Designed to tap into the growth of refrigerated foods, the test products range from tropical fruit salad, chicken salad and pasta salads to cole slaw and range in price from $1.19 to $2.59.

Four refrigerated pasta sauces, packed in clear glass jars, also were introduced. Fresh Chef Classic soups, a six-item line of refrigerated soups, was introduced in Rochester, N.Y., in February, 1986. Spending in support of Fresh Chef sauces and salads totaled nearly $1 million in measured media.

In March, 1986, Campbell acquired Mrs. Giles Kitchens, Lynchburg, Va., a privately held company with 1985 sales of $18 million generated from 35 varieties of salads, in addition to packing Fresh Chef salads.

Campbell also made a move to heighten its presence in the produce aisle, with the test of two varieties of exotic mushrooms in the eastern U.S. and Chicago. It also tested Campbell's Fresh brand asparagus in markets throughout the country.

Supported by $11.7 million in measured spending, Prego spaghetti sauce pulled up to a 30.1% market share of the estimated $847 million sauce market. In 1984 Prego held an estimated 25% share. Its major competitor, Chesebrough-Pond's Ragu, slipped to a 1985 share of 49.4% from 1984's 50%. Prince Co.'s Aunt Millie's and Prince brands hold a combined 6% share.

Two new Prego products were introduced in 1986: Prego al Fresco, a lighter textured sauce, rolled nation-lly in July. Four varieties of Prego ozen dinners were introduced in late ugust. Franco-American canned eals received $3.1 million in mea-ured spending, up 59.7% from 1984 vels.

Reformulations and new products troductions have led to increases in dvertising of Campbell's frozen din-er lines—Swanson dinners and Le lenu—which in the first nine months f the new year were hampered by the eneral softness in that category. Total easured spending on the lines was 26.3 million in 1985, up 21.7%. pending was paced by $13.4 million r Le Menu, up 47%, and $9.6 million r Swanson frozen dinners (breakfast so), down 23.8%. Plump & Juicy fro-en prepared chicken was introduced ith a $2.1 million tv campaign.

During 1985, the aluminum tv din-er tray was phased out in favor of lastic (Goodyear is a supplier) or aper trays suitable for both micro-ve and conventional ovens. An $8 illion effort to reformulate Swanson inners has resulted in more than 100 hanges in 44 varieties of the line, such lighter sauces, less salt, more inter-ting vegetables and new desserts.

Sales of Le Menu gourmet frozen eals remained strong through fiscal 985. Le Menu holds about 14% of the pscale frozen market to Armour Din-er Classics' 18%. Latest additions to e Le Menu line include L'Orient, six arieties of Oriental dinners complete ith chopsticks and a tea bag.

Great Starts, a line of frozen break-st entrees, was rolled out nationally May, 1986. The four-variety line of uffins and biscuits is similar to those opular in fast food restaurants and an be heated in microwave or con-entional ovens.

Pepperidge Farm, Campbell's sec-nd largest operating unit, spent about 4.3 million in measured media in 985, up from only $6.4 million in 984. Spending for Pepperidge Farm ookies soared to $3.4 million from nly $79,000 in 1984. Pepperidge arm crackers also increased in spend-g with $1.5 million in 1985, up 8.7% om 1984. Spending was cut back on rozen Vegetables in Pastry, from $3.3 illion in 1984 to $1.3 million in 985, while a reformulation program ntinues. Norwalk, Conn.-based Pep-ridge Farm also tested several new roducts including frozen English uffins, bagels, muffins and ice eam.

Vlasic Foods launched an $11 mil-on campaign in November to intro-uce Zesty dill pickles, as well as to miliarize consumers with redesigned bels for the entire Vlasic line. hrough calendar 1985, $5.2 million spending was measured in seven edia for Vlasic, down 28%. Zesty has cked up a 3% share of the total pickle arket, according to Selling Areas arketing Inc. Vlasic, based in West loomfield, Mich., is the market ader in the retail pickle category with 31% unit share.

Total measured spending was up 9% for Philadelphia-based Mrs. uls' frozen seafood, to $7.1 million, ith the largest expenditure, $5.9 mil-on, going in support of Mrs. Pauls' rozen Light seafood entrees, up from out $3 million in 1984. The com-ny is one of the top three in the fro-n seafood market, behind General ills' Gorton and Pillsbury's Van de amp's. Counting on consumer pref-ence for fresh fish, Mrs. Pauls' re-ntly introduced Au Naturel fish filets 15 test markets.

During 1985 Campbell purchased a ntrolling interest in Continental oods Company S.A. of Purrs, Bel-um. The company, which had been ivately held, manufactures several nes of sauces, spices preserves, pates, reads and confectionaries.

Canon USA, a division of Tokyo-based Canon Inc., hampered by a slowdown in the U.S. economy and stagnation in the camera market, implemented a widespread cost-cutting program that slashed its measured media spending by 26.5%.

Spending reductions cut across the media board, the largest declines coming in network radio, down 49.2%; network tv, down 35.6%; spot tv, off 33%, and newspapers, down 15.7%.

Worldwide, sales in the business machines segment recorded a gain of 28.3% to $3.4 billion, including $2.1 billion for copiers, up 17.4%. Business machines accounted for 71% of the company's worldwide sales, a marked increase from the 63.8% level of 1984. Camera sales plummeted 15.3%, to $949 million, while optical and other products' sales rose 11.4% to $430.5 million.

To help boost flagging sales of ally advanced single-lens-reflex cameras. The company, which popularized the 35mm format a decade ago with the aid of its "so advanced, it's simple" ad pitch, was victimized by a severe slowdown during the year in the $1.4 billion market. Canon tv spots for the F series featured sportscaster John Madden. Grey Advertising handled.

Canon also encountered new competition in the segment from Eastman Kodak Co., which re-entered the 35mm field after a 16-year absence.

Canon unveiled the non-SLR 35mm models for the fashion-conscious market under Canon's Snappy line, with offerings in red, blue and yellow. One new entry was the Aqua Snappy, a weather-proof version. Now No. 1 in the non-SLR market, Canon also brought out new models in its Sprint line.

Leading National Advertisers, which monitors advertising in six media, reports Canon spent about $5.5 million in measured spending in 1985 to advertise its camera lenses and accessories, down substantially from spending of $25.5 million in 1984.

In home video, Canon in 1985 introduced the Canovision 8, an 8mm camcorder. The company also sought to maintain its presence in the competing vhs format with a new vhs-hifi home deck.

The company early in 1986 introduced a film-less video camera that records still images on a miniature floppy disk. The images then can be viewed immediately on a tv screen with a special attachment or sent to a printer to create color snapshots. Photo images also can be transmitted over telephone lines.

Other strong product lines for Canon in 1985 included electronic typewriters and facsimile machines.

Canon copier sales remained strong in 1985, although the company's measured ad spending in this category declined to $23.6 million, down from more than $26 million in 1984, according to LNA. Copiers accounted for, by far, the company's largest outlay for networktv, at $15.3 million.

Canon maintained its leadership of the plain paper copier field via the 1985 introductions of the faster-speed NP-7550 and NP-8570. Print ads for the 8570, which turns out 70 copies per minute, use the theme line "Speed exceeded only by performance. The choice is Canon."

Canon announced in late 1985 that it would spend about $10 million to build a U.S. manufacturing plant in Newport News, Va. The plant, Canon's second in the U.S., will turn out copiers and is expected to start production by spring.

The fortunes of Capital Cities/ABC Inc., the resulting merger of American Broadcasting Cos. and Capital Cities Communications, are tied closely to the strength of national television advertising. And in 1985 and the first half of 1986, that medium is anything but rosy.

ABC tv network, which contributes two-thirds of total sales to the newly merged company, suffered a decline in income in the first quarter. But a slight income gain in the second quarter at ABC network, cost-cutting measures that are trimming 1,400 from the payroll and a gradual reduction of its compensation payments to affiliates in exchange for freeing up more local advertising time may help spur a turnaround.

During 1985, broadcast revenues at ABC dropped 14% to $2.84 billion while operating income in the division dropped 20% to $340.8 million. These decreases were influenced by record returns in the prior year's related to the financial success of the Olympic games.

The drop would have been greater had 1985 not been a record year in local sales for ABC's owned and operated tv stations. Broadcast also includes cable and radio.

The performance of ABC broadcasting reflected an industrywide slump. Influenced by the economy's slowdown, the three networks declined in revenue nearly 3% to $8.31 billion, the only single-year drop since cigarette were taken off the air in 1971. In the process, ABC dropped to a prime-time September to April average of 14.8 rating, behind NBC's season leading 17.6, and CBS's 16.7. One ratings share translates into an estimated $50 million over the course of a year.

A historical reading of Cap Cities/ABC's financial returns for 1985 (the $5.2 billion purchase by Cap Cities took effect Jan. 1, 1986) showed a combined net income $301 million, down 9%, on revenues of $4.32 billion, down 5.6%.

Separately, American Broadcasting Co.'s contribution (including all divisions) was $158.4 million in net income, down 19%, on revenues of $3.3 billion, down 10%; Cap Cities, largely a newspaper and trade publisher and broadcast company at the time of the purchased, had net income of $142.2 million, up 5% on revenues of $1.02 billion.

The merger left considerable room for streamlining and consolidation of operations into three divisions: ABC Network (Entertainment, Sports, News), broadcast stations (radio, tv, video entertainment, ABC spot sales), and publishing.

The company, in order to effect the merger, had to comply with Federal Communications Commission media crossownership rules preventing multiple ownership of media in the same market. Cap Cities/ABC sold off its cable unit to the Washington Post Co. for $350 million, and four tv and eight radio stations and a daily newspaper.

Proceeds from these dispositions will yield approximately $920 million after related taxes are paid in 1986. The remainder of the purchase price was financed by a combination of $250 million in available cash, $1.375 billion in long-term debt at an average interest rate of 10.2%, the sale of three million shares of common stock, the issuance of $100 million in warrants (to acquire up to 2.9 million shares of the company's common stock) and the balance through the sale of commercial paper.

Cap Cities, lean in management and accustomed to strong profits, found itself facing a poor financial picture in 1986 and a merged partner characterized by a huge payroll and management bureaucracy, moved quickly.

It moved quickly to effect change. New managers at ABC replaced some of the best known names in broadcasting and some of the company's best known broadcast properties were sold. Fred Pierce, the president, resigned in January, a week after the companies completed their merger.

Other top ABC brass departed before and after the merger began, including Tony Thomopoulos, president of ABC Broadcast Group, Everett Erlick, general counsel, and Ben Hoberman, president of radio.

Cap Cities immediately began shrinking the payroll. By this summer, more than 1,000 positions were eliminated, and an additional 400 more jobs, primarily in technical areas, are currently being cut. A number of new executives were added to the corporate roster. John Sias, formerly president of Cap Cities' Fairchild Publications was named president of ABC division of Capital Cities/ABC. Michael Mallardi, formerly chief financial officer for ABC, was named president of the company's broadcasting division.

The owned and operated tv station group, the largest group in the country, was split into eastern and western groups. Named to the presidency of the western region was Kenneth Johnson, formerly president-gm of Cap Cities' KTRK-TV, Houston. Lawrence Pollock, formerly president-gm of WPVI-TV, Philadelphia, was named president of the eastern stations. ABC also discontinued its movie division unit of ABC Motion Pictures in 1985. The movie unit, which produced only six films in four years, among them "The Flamingo Kid," "Prizzi's Honor," "Silkwood," had been a money loser. ABC Motion Pictures continues to produce tv series, however.

Cap Cities/ABC is seeking to build back its audience shares for the ABC Television Network, which have eroded from the No. 1 prime-time network three years ago to No. 3. The other two networks actually cannibalized ABC in 1985-86 as NBC rose dramatically from a 16.2 to 17.6 rating and CBS rose from a 16.7 to 16.9 rating as ABC dropped from 15.5 to 14.8. ABC's strongest suit was daytime. Its 6.3 share in 1985-86 tied CBS for the lead, up from 6.1 share in 1984-85 when it ranked No. 2 to CBS with a 6.7 share.

ABC programs have slid in the ratings as well. "Dynasty" in the September-April season, 1985-86, dropped to No. 6 with a 21.9 rating, compared to its No. 1 position with a 25 rating in 1984-85. "Hotel" fell to No. 22 during the period with an 18.5 rating, compared with its 10th ranking 20 rating the prior year. "Who's the Boss?" rose to No. 11 with a 21.1 rating, compared with its 37th spot and 15.8 rating, and "Monday Night Football" rose to No. 16 with a 19.8 rating from 28th and a 17 rating.

ABC, a master of the extravaganza, pulled off a strong performance with its Liberty Weekend coverage, July 3-6. The network grabbed a 15.9 prime-time rating for the weekend, reduced to 13.9 prime-time for the week, compared with NBC's weekly 11.9 and CBS's 9.5.

ABC reportedly took in about $30 million revenue from the four-day weekend. It paid out $10 million for "exclusive" coverage, but its rival networks, complaining the event was a news happening and therefore nonexclusive, got extra minutes in covering the opening ceremonies when they threatened legal action.

The company "expects that its recovery will take several years and will be both difficult and expensive," according to a company spokesman.

One controversial means of restoring the network's profitability is the withdrawal of compensation payments to affiliates. Compensation payments, which run into the millions, are incentives for affiliates to run with network programing.

All three networks are looking at the system, and CBS has withdrawn such incentives on popular programs in the past, but ABC is venturing further than any network.

Before the affiliates meeting in late spring, 1986, the network backed off of withdrawing all compensation payments, however, it withdrew payments for some sports programs.

For "Monday Night Football," which saw ratings improve in 1985, the network will give affiliates a three-minute window for local advertising in the program in exchange for cash payments. A two-minute network block in daytime baseball playoffs will be turned over for local advertising, while in prime time and weekend playoff games, affiliates will get an extra minute of local time in exchange for compensation payments.

Cap Cities/ABC also has kept measured advertising spending promoting its network, various stations and services at mainteinance-level. Measured advertising slipped 4% to $41.7 million, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Despite the minor drop, the media mix shifted to favor magazines even more—$34.9 million of the total in 1985 vs. $34.1 million in 1984. Spot tv dropped to $4.6 million from $7.4 million in 1984. The lion's share of measured media backed ABC Television Network, $29.8 million in 1985, up from $29.6 million.

Cap Cities/ABC owns and operates eight ABC affiliates capable of reaching just under 25% of U.S. tv homes. At the present time, all of these stations are rated either first or second in their markets in local news and from sign-on to sign-off.

The company owns nine am and eight fm stations serving nine markets, including seven of the top 10 radio markets, and seven radio networks, with over 1,900 affiliated radio stations. Radio operations of the two companies generated more earnings than any other radio group in the U.S. in 1985.

Cap Cities/ABC owns 80% of ESPN, 38% of Arts & Entertainment, and 33% of Lifetime, enabling the company to take advantage of viewer and advertiser growth in these services.

The company's broad assortment of daily and weekly newspapers, weekly and monthy consumer and business publications, special purpose newsletters and book publishing activities represents a strong and growing segment of the company.

CBS Inc. was confronted with dratic problems on three fronts in 5: The company had to fend off a mber of suitors in the merger/take-r mania rampant in the broadcast ustry; CBS encountered softness in advertising sales marketplace and behind rival NBC into second ce in the prestigious prime-time rats race; it also experienced losses m a costly recapitalization program included divestitures of nonessen- business and the discontinuance of toys, theatrical films and home nputer software operations.

The company's losses from discon-ued operations in 1985 totaled .5 million, and CBS incurred losses $120.8 million in the process of dising of these operations—losses that ect directly on CBS' radical reduc- in worldwide net income.

ncluding these losses, CBS' 1985 income of $27 million decreased from 1984's worldwide net inne of $212 million. Net income uld have been $204.3 million, down y 4%, without these one-time rges.

CBS spent enormous amounts of e, energy and expense fending off ecover moves from Jesse Helms'-led rness in Media movement, Ivan sky and Ted Turner. In the process xchanging debt for equity, CBS rechased 21% of its outstanding com- stock for $954.8 million in cash notes effective Aug. 1, 1985. The npany's over-all recapitalization gram is designed to maintain its ndence and enhance the prospects of CBS' three core businesses—broadcasting, recorded music and publishing.

The company is on schedule with its program to raise $300 million in post-tax proceeds from the sale of assets. CBS has generated $200 million so far, most of it applied to debt reduction, and the company has reduced its long-term debt by $232 million. CBS also expects to reach its goal of reducing overhead by $20 million in 1986, well before its yearend 1987 target.

Operating profits declined sharply in CBS' three core businesses in 1985. Operating profits declined 12% to $360.6 million in 1985 at CBS/Broadcast Group because of lower profits at the CBS Television Network, caused by weaknesses in the national tv advertising marketplace, particularly in ad sales for sports programing. The Television Stations and Radio Division reported higher revenues and profits in 1985.

Operating profits for CBS/Records Group declined 29% in 1985 to $87.2 million, as revenues fell 3% as the company was beset by a soft domestic market, a shortage of bona fide hit albums and delayed albums from major artists—conditions opposite to those that produced record profits in 1984. CBS/Records managed to maintain its leading U.S. market position in 1985, with its Columbia label ranked No. 1 in the pop music category for the third consecutive year.

The group's direct marketing operation, Columbia House Division, continued its record-breaking growth. In June, 1985, CBS/Records Group acquired a 50% interest in privately held Winterland Productions, San Francisco. Winterland is engaged in the design, printing and marketing of merchandise for the music and entertainment industries. Its acquisition signals the group's aim of sharing in as many of the revenue streams of its artists as possible.

In 1985, CBS/Publishing Group underwent dramatic changes and experienced a 30% decline in operating profit to $41.1 million on a 14.8% growth in revenues. In the largest acquisition in its history, CBS purchased the 12-title consumer magazine business of Ziff-Davis Publishing Co. in February, 1985, for $362.5 million. Amortization charges related to the Ziff-Davis acquisition contributed to the group's reduced operating profit. The Ziff-Davis acquisition solidified the group's position as the leader in the attractive special interest magazine field.

The segment sold Family Weekly to Gannett in early 1985 for $42.5 million because the publication did not fit the long-term plans for CBS Magazines. The Holt General Book Unit and Praeger, which published specialized academic monographs, also were sold in 1985. Winston-Seabury, a religious publisher, was sold early in 1986. These three small businesses did not fit CBS/Publishing Group's Educational and Professional Publishing division's (CEPP) strategic focus.

CBS experienced a decline in net income for the first quarter of 1986, but generated revenues above the prior-year period. Thomas J. Wyman, chairman and ceo, commented, "While the first quarter's results reflected the impact of a weak national advertising environment and increased program development costs on the television network's performance, and the effect of our higher debt level, CBS benefited particularly from the sharply improved results for the CBS/Records Group and to a lesser degree from the effect of the companywide overhead reduction efforts and a one-time gain from the sale of notes receivable."

Also for the quarter, CBS/Broadcast Group revenues rose 6% on a 66% decline in profits. Improved results for the CBS Television Stations Division and higher profits for the CBS Radio Division (including the five stations purchased from Taft Broadcasting in July, 1985) were negated by the sharp decline in profits from the CBS Television Network. The Taft acquisition raises the number of CBS' am stations to seven and increases its fm stations to 11. CBS/Records Group revenues increased 21% and profits grew 109% from the prior-year period, indicating the impact of U.S. and worldwide sales of recent recorded music releases.

CBS/Publishing Group revenues in the quarter declined 5%, while the group's seasonal operating loss was reduced by 19%. The group's revenue decline and profit improvement were because of the absence of operations divested in 1985.

In November, 1985, Laurence A. Tisch, chairman and ceo of Loews Corp., was elected to the board of directors of CBS Inc. His election raised the number of board members from 13 to 14. Recent reports indicate Loews has purchased close to the 25% of the outstanding CBS common stock the Loews Corp. announced it intended to buy last October.

In February, 1986, CBS Inc. purchased a half interest in Mainstream Communications Corp. Mason Best Co., a Texas-based merchant banking company, owns the other half of the joint venture. The company's current strategy is to spread entrepreneurial risks in communications-related new businesses through joint ventures. In May, 1986, the sale to Viacom International of CBS' KMOX-TV, St. Louis, was completed for a cash purchase price of $122.5 million.

CBS still is engaged in a lawsuit with Ziff-Davis brought by CBS alleging that Ziff-Davis misrepresented the profits of the 12 consumer magazines it put up for sale in late 1984. A New York state supreme court judge dismissed some of the claims (fraud and misrepresentation) against Ziff Corp. in late 1985. CBS contends the judge's decision on these claims is erroneous and intends to appeal. The court, however, let stand CBS' claims for breach of contract and breach of warranty and leaves CBS free to proceed with its claims in those areas.

Past experience alone qualifies CBS Inc. to deal with broadcasting's innate vagaries. Faced with extraordinary financial pressure and uncertainty, interest on debts accumulated in the process of maintaining corporate independence and downbeat revenue projections for many of its broadcast segments, 1986's uncertain atmosphere presents the toughest test its corporate mettle has faced.

Chesebrough-Pond's purchase of Westport, Conn.-based Stauffer Chemical Co. in 1985 opens a new era for the newly consolidated company, but it also brings uncertainty. C-P spent most of 1985 looking inward as a result of the acquisition, a corporate restructuring and several divestitures.

C-P's marketing and applied research strengths could merge well with Stauffer's foundation in new product and process development, while offering new product lines in categories where C-P is not active, such as household cleaners, pesticides, polishes and waxes for homes and cars.

Chesebrough-Pond's fiscal performance for 1985—net sales up 77.3% and net income down 31% and which included Stauffer Co. results beginning March 15, 1985—became stronger in the first six months of fiscal 1986, ended June 30, 1986. Net income of $99.3 million rose from $44.1 million on sales of $1.6 billion, up 37%.

Chesebrough-Pond's did not introduce new brand categories in 1985, but it was active in brand extensions. It was most aggressive in the health and beauty products category with introduction of Rave Hair Masque deep conditioner in early 1985. The product received $7.8 million in measured media, boosting measured spending for the Rave line of permanents and conditioners to $10.5 million, up 92% from 1984. Major spending for Rave products was divided 43% network tv (all for Rave Hair Masque) and 50% magazine.

The health and beauty products division sales in 1985, which climbed 9.4% from 1984, reflected higher sales of Pond's Cream, Vaseline Intensive Care lotions, Cutex nail polish remover and Vaseline petroleum jelly. One of the biggest increases in measured spending was for Q-tips cosmetic applicators, increasing 209% to $1.8 million in 1985. Measured spending for Q-tips cotton swabs held steady at $6.2 million.

Chesebrough-Pond's continued to dominate the $500 million hand-and-body lotion category with its Vaseline Intensive Care lotion, receiving $9.5 million in measured media, down 21% in 1985. Spending was divided 88% network tv, 12% spot tv. Vaseline Intensive Care has nearly 20% of the category's market share, compared with 11% for American Brands' Jergens and 8.4% for Westwood Pharmaceuticals' Keri lotion. S.C. Johnson & Son came out battling in 1985 with about $8 million in network tv, print and coupon spending to expand its 5% market share with the introduction of Soft Sense with Vitamin E.

Chesebrough-Pond's spending in the hand-and-body lotion category also shifted with the addition in early 1985 of Vaseline Lip Therapy petroleum jelly, which received $1.4 million in measured media. Vaseline petroleum jelly received $2.7 million, up from $99,000.

The company also boosted measured spending significantly for Pond's cold cream, increasing outlays by 329% to $6.4 million in 1985. Spending was divided 91% network tv, 5% spot tv and 4% magazine. "We wanted to put some advertising muscle behind Pond's," which has been neglected in recent years, a spokesman says. "We find that whenever we do that we get wonderful results."

The Prince Matchabelli division's sales of health and beauty products increased only 0.5% to $130.5 million in 1985, primarily because of costs associated with new product introductions and softness in the $2.5 billion fragrance category. The division introduced Verve Body Scenting Mist in early 1985, and the Aziza Polishing Pen automatic nail color in late 1984, complementing the growing Aziza cosmetics line, which had estimated 1985 retail sales of about $100 million.

Measured spending for the Aziza line jumped 85% to $5.4 million, largely in magazines (51%) and network tv (37%). Other additions to the Prince Matchabelli line were Decadence, offered by a new marketing branch called Parfums International. Fragrances in general did poorly in 1985, however, with significant declines in the Cachet Noir and Beret women's fragrance lines.

Chesebrough-Pond's package foods division was up 0.7% in 1985 to $346.4 million. The company increased sales of Ragu spaghetti sauce in 1985, a product that already dominates the $840 million category with an estimated 50% share, compared with Campbell Soup Co.'s Prego brand with about a 25% share. The company introduced two new Ragu flavors, in addition to the November, 1985, national launch of Ragu Pasta Meals, a product combining pasta and sauce in a jar that competes with American Home Products' Chef Boy-ar-dee and Campbell Soup Co.'s Franco American canned pastas.

The higher priced Ragu product garnered 15% unit and 18% dollar shares in test markets. A $24 million national print and tv campaign from Waring & LaRosa for Ragu Pasta Meals broke in April, 1986, emphasizing "fresh taste you don't get from a can." The campaign has come under attack from the Can Manufacturers Institute, which has petitioned the Federal Trade Commission, saying the ads falsely infer that glass jars are superior.

The Ragu line received $19.4 million in measured media in 1985, down 18.6%. Ragu spaghetti sauce received $15.7 million of the category's measured spending, divided 66% network tv, 27% network radio and 7% spot tv.

Chesebrough-Pond's troubled Bass Shoe division suffered an operating loss of $14.6 million in 1985 on sales of $170.5 million, reflecting, in part, a soft wholesale market. Sales are expected to improve in 1986 with introduction of Bass Secrets, a line for career women, Bass Air, a line of athletic footwear and the launch of its first national mail order catalog.

Likewise, sales for the Prince division, maker of quality tennis rackets, fell 5.4% in 1985 to $61.9 million, while operating profit fell 7.1%. Measured media for rackets fell 14% in 1985 to $1.9 million. The Prince brand was extended in 1985 to include tennis shoes and apparel. A new line of training clothing was introduced in 1986.

Analysts are impressed with Chesebrough-Pond's ability to pay off its heavy debt from the $1.25 billion Stauffer acquisition. The debt was paid off by March, 1986.

The company is breaking up its Polymer Corp., maker of plastics for appliances and automobiles, which it inherited (for $95 million) in July, 1984, when it bought back about 5% of its shares from New York investor Carl Icahn. Some analysts speculate the Stauffer acquisition was a defensive measure to hold off Mr. Icahn.

Reading, Pa.-based Polymer, once controlled by Mr. Icahn, is being broken up and sold for about $110 million, with its coatings and powders division having gone in July, to Morton Thiokol, Chicago, for an undisclosed sum. Polymer's management is leveraging a buyout of the remaining assets in a transaction expected to be completed by Oct. 1, a spokesman says.

C-P also sold off its Health-Tex division for $270 million in September, 1985, in a management leveraged buyout, and it raised cash through a stock offering in February, 1986, through the termination of an overfunded pension plan at Stauffer, by repatriating much of Stauffer's overseas assets and by entering several sale lease-back transactions on plants and property.

The company netted another $50.2 million from the sale in 1985 of three Stauffer subsidiaries it picked up in the acquisition. Chesebrough-Pond's also has its hospital products division on the block, saying it does not meet with the company's long-term objectives. The Greenwich, Conn.-based division had 1985 pretax earnings of $10 million on sales of $84.4 million.

"You have to give them credit in reducing the debt level. But I still don't think Stauffer was a good fit," says Diane Mustain, analyst with Duff & Phelps in Chicago.

"We still haven't seen any new consumer products coming out of this [Stauffer purchase], or if they will bring some new products to market in the household products and pesticides areas," says Diana Temple, of Salomon Brothers, New York.

In other developments, Chesebrough-Pond's chairman-ceo Ralph E. Ward named Robert M. Phillips president-chief operating officer, effective March 1, 1986. Mr. Phillips becomes a leading contender to succeed Mr. Ward, 65, who retires in two years. Mr. Phillips rejoined Chesebrough-Pond's in May, 1985, as exec vp, reporting directly to Mr. Ward. He was assigned to develop strategies for the Stauffer Chemical division as it prepared to enter the household chemical products business, and to oversee operation of Polymer Co.

In a corporate restructuring, Chesebrough-Pond's simplified its makeup into a consumer products group, made up mainly of package foods, health and beauty offerings and other name brand products, and a chemical products group, which oversees agricultural products, basic chemicals and specialty food products.

Chrysler Corp. advanced a full percentage point in market share to 11.4% in the U.S. car market in 1985, reflecting growth in its sports car and mid-sized offerings.

The company also continued to diversify, buying a high-tech company and three companies to shore up its lending and credit operations. Chrysler also increased its holdings in Mitsubishi, with which it signed an agreement to build a U.S. auto plant, and began restructuring its marketing division to present more distinctive images from its Chrysler, Plymouth and Dodge lineup.

The market share advance, the industry's largest such gain in U.S. retail car sales, also was matched by a 12.8% share in the U.S. retail truck market, up 0.2% from 1984. But the gain was not matched on the earnings side. Earnings dropped 31.3% because of lump sum bonus payments to employes and retirees and the expense of sales and marketing programs in 1985.

The company's U.S. car sales totaled 1,245,149 units in 1985, a 15.4% increase over 1984. Total truck sales rose 15.3% to a record 606,388 units. Chrysler's top-selling car nameplate for 1985 was Plymouth Reliant, with sales of 138,833 units, up slightly from 1984, followed by its Dodge counterpart, the Aries, with sales of 116,284, up 3.8%.

Strong sales of its sports cars, the Chrysler Laser and Dodge Daytona, pushed the company's share of the small specialty market segment to a record 16.4% with respective sales of 50,957 units, down 4.1%, and 49,533 units, up 10.8%. The new-for-1985 Chrysler LeBaron GTS and Dodge Lancer models increased Chrysler's share of the basic middle segment to 11.7%, the highest since 1978.

Over-all, Dodge division reported 1985 unit sales of 434,325, up 17.6% from the previous year; Plymouth unit sales of 329,731 reflected a 14% increase and Chrysler division unit sales of 375,880 were up 14.4%.

Chrysler Corp. continued in 1985 a two-phase strategy: To keep its auto business healthy and thriving, and to diversify. In June, 1985, Chrysler bought 20% of Gulfstream Aerospace Corp., Savannah, Ga., for $127 million to get more technology in aerodynamics and instrumentation. The company made strides in the financial business, forming a joint venture with General Electric Credit Corp., Stamford, Conn., as a commercial lender.

In July, 1985, the company purchased E.F. Hutton Credit Corp., New York, for $125 million and renamed it Chrysler Capital Corp. In November, it acquired FinanceAmerica, Allentown, Pa., renaming it Chrysler First Inc.

In August, Chrysler signed a joint venture agreement with Mitsubishi Motors Corp. to prpduce a new line of cars in the U.S. starting in 1988. The new company, Diamond-Star Motors Corp., is headquartered in Bloomington-Normal, Ill. The plant will have a capacity of 240,000 cars a year, with Chrysler and Mitsubishi splitting output equally.

August also brought the domestic auto industry more finance incentive battles. GM offered 7.7% consumer loan rates on some 1985 model closeouts because of a Teamsters strike that delayed shipment of vehicles. Other domestic auto companies responded, including Chrysler with 8.8% financing or a $500 rebate on Dodge Lancer and Chrysler LeBaron GTS, and 8.8% or $400 rebate on K-cars. Undercutting continued into 1986 when in July the company set new sales incentives of 5.5% financing or

Planning for future should be a priority

Spencer C. Boise, vp-corporate affairs, Mattel Inc. and immediate past chairman of the board of Assn. of National Advertisers—the first chair from a West Coast-based member company—says he is concerned with future planning that is being built into the ANA as a committee.

"We haven't had a formal, high-visibility committee, but future planning will become a standing committee. I think it is a great opportunity for smaller advertisers who want to take part in ongoing work of the organization."

Mr. Boise, who is a member of the ANA executive committee and chairs the nominations committee, headed a task force that examined the eligibility of new members and the ANA dues structure.

"We are taking a new look at national and regional advertisers and reaffirming our basic purpose and objectives," he explains. "We've had to accommodate and adjust for increased mergers. We have addressed this, we believe, with a new, streamlined organization and increased service to members. What this means long term is to gain considerable representation in Washington and expand opportunities for professional seminars and workshops for what amounts to postgraduate advertising courses."

Mr. Boise joined Mattel in 1971 and served in a number of positions related to marketing, advertising, public relations and consumer affairs before undertaking his current responsibilities including corporate and marketing public relations, investor and shareholder relations and consumer affairs.

He has several observations on the trend to agency megamergers and potential for account conflicts.

"The immediate reaction was that [megamergers] disturbed many of the larger advertisers. It may mean that agency consolidations have the potential for unrest, and we may see some fallout . . . some creative people leaving to start smaller shops," he says.

Spencer C. Boise
Mattel Inc.

But, Mr. Boise says, such a move may not be all bad, and he cites the recent example of advertising executive Sandy (Sanford) Buschbaum, who left Revlon to form his own agency.

"In this climate, we have to seize the opportunities as they come," he says.

Mr. Boise, who is a member of the company's advertising review committee and a director of Mattel Foundation, previously worked in brand management and marketing public relation posts at Procter & Gamble.

On the issue of shorter rollout time for new products, Mr. Boise says he has two distinct points of view.

"The P&G perspective was one where we had traditionally a long industry-wide rollout time to test products. At Mattel—with toys, a very creative area—and leisure-time interest on the part of parents and children as to what's new, there is constant pressure to be creative. The toy industry moves rapidly. Because of competition, I believe the trend to shorter rollout time will continue. The problems can come with shorter rollouts, though, such as more failures and less profit and more shareholder pressure."

Previously, Mr. Boise was senior vp-general manager of the Los Angeles office of Harshe-Rotman & Druck. In addition to his ANA work, Mr. Boise has been director of the Council of Better Business Bureaus and previous national president, director and foundation trustee for the Society of Consumer Affairs Professionals.

up to $1,500 rebates on most models through Sept. 6, matching GM and Ford extensions. Chrysler backed its program with major-market newspaper ads.

In the fall of 1985, Chrysler continued the theme, "All the Japanese you need to know" for 1986 vehicles built by Mitsubishi Motors Corp. for Chrysler. The company's goal was to set its captive imports apart from its domestically built cars by positioning them as Japanese. The company increased its holdings in Mitsubishi Motors from 15% to 24%. With the easing of import quotas, Chrysler projected selling 225,000 Japanese-built models in the 1986 model year, a 43% increase over the 1985 model year, to protect itself from the import surge.

Colt four-door sedans and a new four-wheel-drive Colt Vista, a "tall" station wagon, got extra ad support in both tv and print that were aimed predominantly at women.

Chrysler's September-breaking ads for 1986 models were patriotic and comparative. The positioning reflected thinking that Chrysler faces a long-term competitive disadvantage against imports. It also masked a strong boost in ad spending, a shift to its Plymouth brand and changes in media selection. Chrysler used more daytime and prime time tv, radio and cable tv in 1986.

In ads, Chrysler's corporate aim was to "be the best." Plymouth was "Born in America," and Dodge again was "An American Revolution." Chrysler-brand ads said: "Chrysler technology makes 'Made in America' mean something again." Plymouth was no longer the low brand of Chrysler-Plymouth, getting a three-fifths share of C-P spending in the introductory quarter rather than the usual two-fifths.

Dodge car ads were not comparative, but trucks were. In one spot touting Chrysler's five-year/50,000-mile warranty, a new Dodge truck falls from the sky, but Chevy and Ford warranties "fall short," and those trucks dance off the ground. BBDO, Southfield, Mich., handles Dodge.

In November, 1985, Chrysler reorganized into four operating groups to set the stage for more acquisition and diversification. The groups are Chrysler Motors, which includes all U.S. and foreign automotive operations; Chrysler Financial Corp.; Gulfstream Aerospace Corp., and Chrysler Technologies, designed to become the engine for future Chrysler expansion and diversification.

With the reorganization, Bennett Lidwell, exec vp-sales and marketing, moved to vice-chairman of Chrysler Corp., handling corporate planning and over-all marketing strategies. E. Thomas Pappert was promoted to group vp-sales, from vp-sales. He and Joseph Campana, vp-marketing, now report to Harold Sperlich, who became president of Chrysler Motors from president of Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca's office of the chairman was renamed the corporate executive committee and expanded to include Robert Miller Jr. as a new vice-chairman of Chrysler Corp., as well as that of Chrysler Financial.

In April, 1986, Chrysler decided to live for market share by passing up the chance to match $400 average price increases by GM and importers. It capitalized on competitors' price hikes via ads in newsweeklies that again featured Mr. Iacocca.

In July, Chrysler reached an agreement with AMC for AMC to build as many as 150,000 M-body cars, including the Chrysler Fifth Avenue, at AMC's underutilized Kenosha, Wis., plant. AMC will be paid per car. The deal solves a production capacity problem for Chrysler.

Also that month, Chrysler reviewed Dodge division's $125 million relationship with BBDO after that agency merged with Doyle Dane Bernbach, which handles Volkswagen, and Needham Harper Worldwide, which has creatives within the agency before agreeing to keep Dodge at BBDO.

In June, 1986, Dodge introduced its new '87 midsized pickup truck, the Dodge Dakota. The Dakota is targeted to open a new market segment between compact and full-size pickups.

Also in June, Mr. Iacocca challenged Ford's ad claim of having America's best-built cars and trucks, conducting its own survey among 1986 domestic vehicle buyers that put it ahead of GM and Ford. Ads jabbed at Ford, saying Chrysler is today's best producer of vehicles, implying that Ford may have been yesterday's best.

Two weeks later it broke a network tv spot on the same day Ford broke print ads asserting its claim. Chrysler demanded Ford withdraw its ad, threatening to sue. So far the case has not been resolved.

The company spent between $40 million and $50 million for a late-summer introduction of the Dodge Shadow and Plymouth Sundance. The kickoff of its 1987-88 new product drive included: A new Dodge theme; Chrysler's first use of 15-second tv spots; U.S. Olympic team sponsorship, and heavier targeting of women. The campaign also was the first step in a sweeping restructuring of Chrysler marketing divisions.

Chrysler, Plymouth and Dodge got more distinctive images and marketing tasks. Plymouth, traditionally Chrysler's plain-Jane price leader, became the more upscale import-fighter pitted against Pontiac and the Ja new. Sundance costs $100 more than Shadow, a reversal of the old pricing structure. Chrysler emphasizes luxury and competes against Ford's Lincoln-Mercury and GM's Buick, Oldsmobile and Cadillac. Dodge remains Chrysler's power and performance division, aimed at big-volume Ford and Chevrolet with positioning to appeal to young and blue-collar buyers.

To sharpen images over-all, Chrysler turned to more division-exclusive models in 1987.

The performance-oriented Laser was dropped from luxury division Chrysler, leaving Dodge with an exclusive Daytona. Dodge got an exclusive performance version of Shadow; Chrysler got an exclusive on the all-new '87 LeBaron.

"Setting new standards of performance" replaced "An American revolution" as Dodge's ad theme. The campaign kicks off Sept. 14 with sponsorship of the CBS-TV movie "The Last Days of Patton," starring George C. Scott, who became AMC ad spokesman after Chrysler agreed to sponsor the show.

Both Plymouth and Dodge started prelaunch name-awareness campaigns for Sundance and Shadow in late August with 15-second TV spots. After a 90-day introductory phase of 80% TV, the media mix will drop to half broadcast and half print. Ads for the sporty ES version of Shadow said, "Dodge is casting its Shadow across America," and for the four-door for families, "The Shadow knows how to treat your family."

In late 1989, Chrysler plans to introduce a new LeBaron midsized specialty coupe and convertible models. It will be followed by a luxury, two-seat sport convertible Chrysler is developing jointly with Maserati. For 1993 the company will launch an all-new, compact, four-door sedan to replace the venerable K-cars, Aries and Reliant.

Other new products will range from a youthful new subcompact from Diamond-Star Motors to a new entry in the large luxury car segment.

Introducing the Harte-Hanks Direct Network.

Now you can make direct marketing a part of your media mix as easily, and as efficiently, as a network broadcast buy.

With the first network that specializes in all aspects of direct marketing. Our network. The Harte-Hanks Direct Network.

Why Direct Deserves More Of Your Ad Dollars.

The reasons are all around you. They're the 240 million plus individuals that make up the U.S. market. And their extremely diverse lifestyles.

Targeting is no longer a media technique. It's a survival technique. And nobody does that better than we do.

Why Us Versus The Other Direct Marketers?

It's not because we've been doing it longer. Or because we're bigger than most of the others. It's because we can deliver a greater return on your direct marketing dollar. And that's not a function of size. It's a function of scope.

First We'll Help You Find Your Customer.

We can do that in a number of ways. Our Marketing Services Group can conduct qualitative or quantitative studies to profile the people with the highest potential for you.

Or, using your existing customer files or profiles, we'll put the power of computerized databases to work. Databases that encompass approximately 98% of the U.S. households.

Databases with the names and addresses of almost every individual in the U.S. But more importantly, databases with the most complete and comprehensive customer profiling capabilities you've ever experienced.

The result—the most accurate list of prime potential customers you've ever encountered.

Once We've Found Them, We'll Show You How To Move Them.

Creating a direct mail piece your customers can't refuse to open is something the people at Harte-Hanks Direct Marketing excel in. And their collective creativity and savvy is yours when you buy into the Harte-Hanks Direct Network.

We Have 27 Production Plants Standing By.

Last year, the Harte-Hanks Network handled over five billion direct mail pieces. And many times within deadlines that are hard to imagine.

And our printing capacity covers everything from self-mailers to full color catalogs.

Nobody Moves It Through The Mail Like We Do.

Because nobody knows the U.S. Postal Service like we do. But that only makes sense, since we're one of their largest customers.

That helps you a number of ways. The first is in that most precious of commodities—time. We've developed a number of systems to insure your mailing moves through the postal system quickly and efficiently.

The second is one of economics. We can put your direct mail program in the mail at the absolute most cost effective rate available. Even if it means using our own trucking firm to deliver your materials to various postal zones. (A technique that recently saved one of our customers $85,000 on one mailing alone.)

All women 24 to 49 aren't alike. The Harte-Hanks Direct Network delivers only the ones with the highest potential for you.

Some Typical Successful Network Buys.

- By more accurately isolating potential customers with the highest likelihood of purchase, Harte-Hanks Network lowered the overall mailing list by 30%, dramatically reduced mailing costs, yet maintained sales levels for a major national retail chain.
- A 65-unit furniture store chain improved sales during a historically slow sales period by 20% as a result of their network buy.

We Never Let Your Hot Prospects Cool Off.

Our Telemarketing Group can handle all customer responses via our 800 number system.

Our Fulfillment Group can respond quickly to every type of promotion or customer inquiry.

We can even provide complete response analysis. To determine what aspects of the program worked best, and thus make every subsequent mailing work even better.

Just Call Us. Direct.

It's easy to reach the network at Harte-Hanks. Just pick up the phone and call 1-800-526-5368. Or write Harte-Hanks Direct Marketing, National Marketing Headquarters, 1329 Arlington Street, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225-1380.

So call or write today. Because whether you use the services of the entire network, or only select a few, the sooner you call, the sooner you'll see how effective a network buy can be for you. With Harte-Hanks.

Clorox Co., which continues its drive to lessen its dependence upon its once sole product, liquid chlorine bleach, is expanding its ad budget to boost new products ranging from household cleansers and laundry detergents to mesquite charcoal and salad dressings.

Clorox's drive to diversify through an aggressive program of new product development seems to be paying off. While only four years ago, bleach sales accounted for about 50% of its total earnings, today they make up 30%. Sales of liquid and dry bleach account for 40% of Clorox's profits, however.

Clorox continues to support Clorox liquid chlorine bleach substantially, spending $9.3 million in 1985, down only 1% from 1984.

With an eye to boost its 57.2% of the sluggish U.S. bleach market, estimated at $600 million by Clorox, the company began shipping its premium-priced Fresh Scent Clorox liquid bleach in January, 1986. Analysts are optimistic about the long-range prospects for Fresh Scent, predicting it may increase its sluggish bleach business by as much as 5% in coming years.

Clorox promotes the bleach-that-doesn't-smell-like-a-bleach with tv commercials promising, "Fresh Scent Clorox delivers the same cleaning and Clorox quality in a new fresh scent." Fresh Scent's packaging resembles that of Clorox's traditional liquid bleach, but its cap and diamond insignia are different colors.

The company hopes to brighten its prospects in the $452 million household cleaner market by introducing Tackle, a disinfectant containing bleach. Clorox supported the rollout of the herbal-scented cleaner, touted for use in cleaning bathrooms, kitchens and floors, with tv and print advertising, accompanied by coupons and retail trade events to encourage trial. Media spending for Tackle, which so far has captured 3% of the all-purpose pine oil liquid cleaners market, totaled $9 million. The company didn't market test the herbal-scented cleaner, which shipped nationally in February.

Unlike Tackle, Clorox chose to test Fresh Scent, the herbal scented version of its liquid chlorine bleach, for nearly three years. It had been tested in Dallas, Memphis, Wichita, Kansas City and Oklahoma City.

At present, Clorox has two new products in test markets. In August, 1985, the company entered the $2.6 billion laundry detergent market, introducing Act, a concentrated laundry detergent in an unusual premeasured "action pak," in Bakersfield, Cal. The company since has taken Act out of Bakersfield, but expanded the test into Dallas, Atlanta and Oklahoma City.

Marketing powerhouse Procter & Gamble, Clorox's former parent, quickly reacted to Act's introduction, coming out with a similar new product called Cheer Power Pouches. The Cheer pouches since have been removed from test market, and the product's fate is uncertain.

In September, Clorox began testing a new heavy-duty abrasive liquid cleanser called Strike. It is currently available in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Georgia and Texas. At the same time, P&G began testing a soft abrasive cleanser under its Mr. Clean brand in Dallas-Fort Worth.

In 1984, Clorox gave up on another test product, Wave, a heavy-duty dry bleach, after it failed to perform well in two attempts at test marketing. Wave competed against Vibrant, a P&G brand in test since 1981.

Other products in Clorox's brand line receiving sizable media backing were Tilex tile cleaner and Clorox 2 bleach. Tilex mildew stain remover remains the leader in its category, with media spending remaining stable at $2.2 million. Clorox 2, with a 60% share of the all fabric bleach segment, received media support of $10 million, up 2.5% from 1984.

Spending for Liquid-Plumr declined 20%, to $3.8 million, while Clorox boosted spending for its Soft Scrub cleanser 20%, to $7.1 million.

The company continued to build on the success of its bottled Hidden Valley Ranch salad dressing line, adding a Thousand Island flavor to its Original, Country Recipe and Garden Herb varieties in 1985. In April, 1986, the company also added an Original Ranch with Bacon flavor. Clorox introduced the bottled line, a variation on its successful dry mix, in 1984.

In February, 1985, Clorox introduced a reduced calorie version of its Hidden Valley Ranch original flavor dry mix salad dressing.

Though the company's architectural coatings business (paints and stains) contributed 10% of total sales, analysts call the division a disaster. Basically four years in the making, beginning with Clorox's purchase in 1981 of Olympic and Carver Tripp paints and stains from Comerco Inc. and followed by the 1983 acquisition of marketing rights to Lucite from Du Pont, the business continues to flounder.

To date, Clorox has invested $180 million in the Lucite and Olympic brands, only to see the products' market share erode. Spending for Lucite dropped 17% to $3.6 million. Olympic paints and stains declined 18% to $4 million.

Clorox increased its presence in the $260 million cat box filler market in 1984 when it added Fresh Step, an odor-controlling cat litter, to its first entry, Litter Green.

Alfalfa-based Litter Green, introduced in 1971, has continued to lose share, while clay-based Fresh Step, which features a microencapsulated fragrance released whenever a cat steps on or scratches the litter, has boosted its share to 15%.

Fresh Step drew $2.4 million in 1985 in measured spending, down 64% from 1984's $6.6 million. Clorox discontinued advertising for Litter Green in 1985.

In July, 1985, Clorox split advertising responsibilities into product categories among its three largest agencies, reassigning some brands among Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, and Young & Rubicam and Foote, Cone & Belding, both San Francisco. Needham, responsible for Clorox's charcoal and cleanser categories, added Match Light instant lighting charcoal briquets and Soft Scrub mild abrasive liquid cleanser, both from FCB. Y&R, which handles the salad dressing, architectural coatings and cat litter categories, picked up Lucite interior and exterior paints from Needham.

FCB, the client's agency for bleach and hard-surface cleaners, won two unidentified new product assignments.

Clorox continues to update existing products to keep abreast of changing consumer preferences. In April, 1985, it came out with Kingsford charcoal with mesquite.

A year later, Clorox introduced a new formula for its Match Light instant lighting charcoal briquets that can be lit without lighter fluid.

Clorox updated its Twice As Fresh air freshener line in April, 1986, adding a Honeysuckle Morning fragrance to the now seven-fragrance line.

In December, 1985, Clorox assumed a leadership role, asking the tv networks to begin accepting stand-alone 20-second commercials, a move that would further erode the 30-second spot as the tv standard.

So far, only CBS has accepted the independent 20s, providing Clorox find its own partners in the 60-second commercial pod. At present, Clorox doesn't have any 20-second commercials on the air.

Clorox has announced its intention to divest the company's Emil Villa's Hick'ry Pit restaurant division, deciding that the chain doesn't fit into its long-term strategy.

In October, president Charles R. Weaver was elected ceo. John W. Collins, exec vp, succeeded Mr. Weaver as chief operating officer. Former chair-

The year has seen some bubbles pierced in Coca-Cola Co.'s considerable array of carbonation. In particular, Coca-Cola gave up its bid to buy Dallas-based Dr Pepper Co. for $470 million in the face of an antitrust challenge from the Federal Trade Commission. The merger would have boosted Coca-Cola's share of the soft drink market from 38.6% to 45.7%.

After voting that the acquisition would reduce competition in the industry, the FTC went to court to argue the deal would increase beverage prices and damage smaller competitors. A federal judge ordered a temporary injunction pending FTC administrative hearings. With that, Coca-Cola said it had called off the merger plans.

One of those small competitors, Royal Crown Cola Co., then dropped its antitrust challenge in federal court in Georgia. But the end of the deal hardly meant the demise of Coca-Cola. One analyst suggests the company still will garner the 45.7% share of the market, only it will take longer.

Coca-Cola's nearly $8 billion in net operating revenues in 1985 maintained its position as the largest manu-

Coca-Cola has further shored up its position with the announcement it will make the largest acquisition in the company's history—the $1.4 billion buyout of Coca-Cola bottling properties owned by the Chattanooga, Tenn.-based JTL Corp. Two weeks before that announcement, Coca-Cola agreed to pay $1 billion to buy all the Coke bottling operations of Chicago-based Beatrice Cos.

Together with what the company already owned, the acquisitions will give Coca-Cola control of about 31% of its domestic volume. Coca-Cola president-ceo Donald Keough says the company may now create a new "free-standing" bottling company that might make a public offering of stock.

Coca-Cola also added to its interests in the entertainment sector with the purchase last year of two tv production companies, Embassy Communications and Tandem Productions. In August, 1985, it sold the Embassy Home Entertainment subsidiary to a Canadian company, Nelson Holdings International Ltd. of Vancouver, for $85 million.

Coca-Cola already had paid an estimated $200 million for Merv Griffin Enterprises in 1985 and, with it, rode the wave of two of the hottest shows in syndication, the cerebral "Jeopardy" and the heart-thumping "Wheel of Fortune."

Coca-Cola's Columbia Pictures is scoring success this summer with "Karate Kid, Part II," which through mid-August had tallied more than $85 million in gross theater receipts, and its Tri-Star Pictures' "About Last Night," grossing over $45 million through mid-August. Coca-Cola owns 42% of Tri-Star, which had the No. 2 box office hit of 1985 in "Rambo: First Blood-Part II," grossing $135 million. Columbia released the big hit in 1984, "Ghostbusters."

To further shore up its entertainment business, the company this year also made Walter Reade Organization, operator of 12 motion picture screens in New York City, a wholly owned subsidiary.

The company in 1985 bought Nutri-Foods International, a maker of fruit juice dessert products, and sold Presto Products, a supplier of plastic packaging, and Winkler/Flexible Products, a supplier of plastic cutlery and straws.

To support it all, Coca-Cola spends heavily on advertising. It reported to the Securities & Exchange Commission total worldwide media advertising costs of $629.9 million in 1985, a hike of nearly 18% from the year earlier.

Beverage Industry, a trade journal, reports Coca-Cola spent $130.4 million to advertise its major brands—Coca-Cola Classic, Coke, diet Coke, cherry Coke, diet Sprite and Tab—on tv last year. BI reports Pepsi-Cola spent $107.6 million for tv advertising on seven major brands.

Coca-Cola measured spending in 11 media monitored in this report was $231.6 million in 1985. The Leading National Advertisers seven-media total was $210 million, down 4.4%. New Coke, the slightly sweeter drink introduced amid consumer resistance last year, accounted for about $52 million of this and diet Coke, $32.2 million.

Coca-Cola, with its various brands, leads archrival Pepsi-Cola with a 38.6% share of market, compared with Pepsi's 27.4%. Dr Pepper trails with 7.1% and Seven-Up Co., 6.3%. However, brand Pepsi leads the individual entries with a 17.4% share, down from 17.6% in 1984, according to John C Maxwell, analyst with Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney, New York.

Brand Pepsi moved into the No. 1 spot by default because of the splitting of former No. 1 Coke into Classic and regular Coke, a multibrand strategy, planned or not, that gave Coca-Cola a higher corporate share.

Coca-Cola's Coca-Cola Classic is the No. 2 individual leader with a 14.2% share, with regular Coke No. 3 at 7.0% and diet Coke No. 4 at 6.7%, up from 5.2%. Comparative figures for regular Coke and Classic in 1985 are not applicable because of the lack of a full-year's performance for either.

The company's Sprite ranked No. 7 among all soft drinks with a 3.7% market share, up from 3.4%, and one notch behind No. 6, Seven-Up, with a 4.7% share.

Dr Pepper would have provided Coca-Cola with the No. 5-ranked brand at 5.6%, up from 5.2%. Over-all Dr Pepper Co.'s share in the soft drink market is 7.1%, up from 7% in 1984.

Coca-Cola is even a bigger winner in the rapidly growing diet side of the soft drink market with a 44.1% market share in 1985, up from 43.5%. PepsiCo grew to a 24.9% share, up from 21.5%. Dr Pepper was the big loser, dropping to 4.8% from 6%.

In the sluggish caffeine-free sector, Coca-Cola moved against PepsiCo. Its 3 .5% share of market in 1985 rose from 31.5% in 1984 as PepsiCo's 43.8% slipped from 44.7% in 1984, according to Mr. Maxwell.

Coca-Cola helped unfold a new category in 1985 with the introduction of Cherry Coke, No. 11 in the over-all soft drink market. The product finished the year with a 1.6% share of market with case sales of 110 million. It achieved the highest sales of a new entry in its first year on the market by Mr. Maxwell. Other cherry colas soon hit the market, including Cherry Royal Crown, with a 0.2% share, and cherry cola Slice.

With it's "Catch the wave" and "Just for the thrill of it" campaigns, Coca-Cola is, according to analyst Martin Romm of First Boston Corp., trying to "associate Coca-Cola with everything that's good about America."

And the campaign for Coca-Cola Classic, the company's leading soft drink, "reflects the image of the modern American spirit," according to Ira C. Herbert, exec vp and corporate marketing director of Coca-Cola Co. He adds the "Red, white and you" campaign reflects the "mood, the tempo, the confidence and optimism of living in the U.S.A. in the 1980s."

Colgate-Palmolive Co. increased product introductions and focused on its core businesses of personal and healthcare products in 1985. It also pulled $100 million in advertising from Ted Bates Worldwide, its agency for 46 years, after that agency agreed to merge with Saatchi & Saatchi plc, London, one of the agencies serving archrival Procter & Gamble.

The company accelerated product introductions last year to 227, backed with a record $82 million in product research and development, while it revamped advertising strategies, packaging and product formulations for nearly all its major brands.

Revamped or reformulated products included lemon-lime Palmolive dishwashing liquid, Ajax multisurface cleaner, Dynamo 2 and Liquid Fab laundry detergent with fabric softener. New products include Cleopatra luxury beauty bar, Colgate Plus toothbrushes, and Dentagard toothpaste.

Colgate's new alignment of its global agency business emphasized its commitment to regional rather than global marketing.

In December, it realigned $40 million worth of global ad business among its then three agencies, Bates, Foote, Cone & Belding and Young & Rubicam, leaving Bates at the time in charge of only one European account, in Spain, but the dominant agency in the Asia-Pacific area. After the megamerger fallout in March, 1986, FCB, strong in Colgate's Latin American business, picked up the Colgate assignments in the Asia-Pacific area as well, from Bates to join from Y&R in the region.

Y&R, Colgate's dominant agency in Europe, is now Colgate's top worldwide agency with billings of about $150 million. FCB has worldwide Colgate billings of about $125 million.

Major brand reassignments in the wake of the Bates-Saatchi marriage include Colgate regular and gel toothpastes, with $31 million in measured media last year, Colgate toothbrushes and Palmolive Rapid Shave going to Y&R. That agency already handled Colgate's Fresh Start laundry detergent and Irish Spring soap. Dentagard toothpaste, introduced last year with $13.4 million in measured spending, was reassigned to FCB from Y&R.

From Bates, FCB got Palmolive dishwashing liquid, with $7 million in 1985 measured media. FCB already handles Fab, Ultrabrite, Palmolive soap and Curad bandages.

Measured advertising spending for all of Colgate's brands was down 2% over-all, largely reflecting a 5% decline in network tv and a 27% decline in spot tv spending. Despite the decline in U.S. measured ad spending, Colgate's worldwide marketing and promotional spending increased 3.5% over-all, partially as a result of C-P's reentry into the Middle East after the Arab boycott in 1976. Reported media advertising costs, however, declined 12.5%, to $270 million in 1985 from $304 million in 1984.

Colgate continued its divestiture of businesses unrelated to household, personal care, healthcare and specialty consumer marketing—all attracting minimal ad spending. In February, 1986, the company sold its Riviana Foods subsidiary, a rice processor, and Etonic Inc., the Brockton, Mass., maker of athletic shoes and clothing, for $100 million. Its Knoxville, Tenn.-based Bike Athletic subsidiary is still searching for a buyer. Colgate in 1985 acquired a 50% interest in Institutional Financing Services, a company that assists schools in fund-raising efforts through direct marketing of consumer products.

Modest growth in the household & personal care division, in which worldwide sales increased 2% last year, came largely from increased toothpaste sales. Laundry and dishwashing detergents accounted for 32% of these sales, down 1 percentage point from 1984, and oral products accounted for a steady 17%.

Colgate's continued rise in toothpaste sales was backed by only slight increases in measured ad spending last year, up 4% to $29 million. Two-thirds of that total went into network tv spending for the "WMFP-radioland" new wave spots, via Ted Bates.

Colgate spent heavily in the early 1980s trying to catch rival Procter & Gamble's Crest brands, and early last year came close to bumping Crest out of the top spot in the $1 billion dentifrice category. P&G backed its Crest brands with $50 million last year, just as Colgate was slowing its early-1980s ad spending surge behind Colgate brand toothpaste. Measured ad spending for Colgate declined 22.5% in 1984, from a 1983 high of $34 million.

P&G rebuilt its share lead from a low of 30.5% in 1984 to 37% to 39% by the end of 1985, while Colgate dipped from 28% to 22% in the same period. At the end of 1985, Beecham Products' Aqua-Fresh brands was third in retail market share with 12%; Lever Bros.' Aim toothpaste fell to 7%.

An estimated $40 million ($13.4 million measured) in ad spending backed the national rollout of Dentagard plaque-fighting toothpaste last year. Aimed at adults concerned about healthy gums rather than cavities, Dentagard's $40 million introduction tried to blunt P&G's $37 million introduction of Crest tartar-control formula toothpaste.

Further line extensions include Dentagard tartar-control formula, which went into test this February in Denver, and Dentagard toothbrushes and dental floss, introduced in mid-1985, with print support in dental journals via Wilk & Brichta, Chicago. Dentagard also rolled into Australia last September, the first Colgate toothpaste introduction there since the 1960s, and the Colgate tartar control formula was introduced in the U.K. in late April, with a $4.5 million campaign from Y&R.

Colgate Plus toothbrushes, introduced last summer, became the market sales volume leader in pushing past Johnson & Johnson's Reach and Gillette's Oral-B to take the lead in the toothbrush market. The diamond-shaped toothbrushes rolled out nationally in mid-1985 with $3 million in measured ad support, equally divided between magazines and spot tv.

Colgate is aiming for dominance in the $550 million automatic-dishwasher-detergent category, where liquids are the hot new segment. Analysts expect this new category to begin to cut deeply into the powder market, perhaps as much as 50% within several years. Liquid detergents now hold 30% share of the $3.5 billion heavy-duty detergent market.

Colgate was the first major soap company to introduce an automatic dishwasher liquid last year when it began testing Bright Side, formerly the name of its failed shampoo entry, in the third quarter of 1985. A Bright Side campaign was expected to break in March of this year, but national rollout was delayed because of problems with the detergent separating in the bottle.

In July, Y&R broke a $30 million campaign for the product, renamed Palmolive Automatic to capitalize on the Palmolive liquid dishwashing detergent name. Current spending on Palmolive Automatic is nearly twice the amount spent last year on any single brand in the automatic-dishwasher detergent category.

Colgate is being challenged by Electrasol liquid, placed in national distribution earlier this year, from Economics Laboratories, St. Paul, Minn. Another potential competitor, Lever Bros.' liquid Sunlight brand, is being tested in Minneapolis. Lever holds a 23% share of the powdered dishwasher detergent market with its All and Sunlight brands, compared with an estimated 50% for P&G's Cascade. Electrasol has an estimated 10%.

P&G began testing Cascade liquid automatic dishwasher detergent in June in Orlando, Phoenix and Milwaukee, hoping to capitalize on the popularity of its Cascade powder dishwasher detergent.

Measured media support for Palmolive dishwashing liquid fell 31% in 1985 to $6.8 million, as Colgate readied the introduction of lemon-lime Palmolive Liquid. Last year Palmolive Liquid overtook P&G's Dawn, the previous market leader.

Ajax liquid cleaner was backed by only $348,800 in measured spending last year, a sharp 90% drop from 1984's measured $3.6 million. Ajax multisurface cleanser was reformulated, repackaged and reintroduced nationally in November with an estimated $11 million campaign from Y&R.

Fresh Start concentrated laundry detergent had measured spending in 1985 of $8.8 million, up from $8.3 million in 1984. Fresh Start detergent with "SRP," a new cleaning ingredient, was in test in California as of May, 1986. Comparative tv spots end with the tag, "Be a Tide [P&G] dropout—make a Fresh Start."

New liquid Fab laundry detergent with fabric softener rolled out nationally last November with $11 million in measured media spending from FCB/New York. Measured support for powdered Fab laundry detergent, Colgate's leading brand, decreased dramatically to only $449,300 from $13.4 million in 1984. The decline made way for the new product introduction.

Reformulated Dynamo 2 liquid detergent also rolled out in November with $366,300 in measured media spending via FCB/New York. Dynamo Action Plus liquid laundry detergent, introduced in 1984, continued to receive heavy ad support, with $5.2 million last year, down 47% from 1984.

Irish Spring deodorant soap, reformulated with conditioners, went national in March of this year after being tested for more than a year in Denver and several other markets. Measured media spending for the brand fell 17%, however, from $5.8 million in 1984 to $4.8 million in 1985. Y&R supports with a multi-million-dollar, three-spot tv campaign. Cleopatra soap, a luxury beauty bar, is being tested in Eau Claire, Wis. and Visalia, Cal. via FCB/New York, and nationally in France, via Publicis, Paris. Test marketing could take up to a year, Colgate officials say.

In the healthcare and industrial division, Boston-based Kendall Co. was restructured last year toward becoming a major hospital supply company, with last November's $117 million acquisition of the McGaw division, maker of intravenous solutions, from American Hospital Supply Corp. and the purchase of the Boundary line of disposable hospital linens from P&G.

Kendall's consumer home healthcare business expanded with Curity skincare lotion, incontinency products and the adaptation of the Curity line of surgical dressing for consumers. Curad bandages last year received measured spending of $2.7 million.

In March, 1986, American Fiber & Finishing, Boston, purchased the industrial fabrics division of Kendall for more than $20 million. Kendall also sold its Curity Baby Products division to Gerber Products, Fremont, Mich., for an estimated $50 million. Curity infant apparel accounted for $85 million in sales last year.

In April, 1986, it sold MedSonics, a medical equipment unit, maker of ultrasonic blood-flow monitors, to Japanese-based Settsu Paperboard Manufacturing Co. for an undisclosed price.

Growth in sales at Colgate's specialty marketing division came largely from a 27% gain in pet food sales in the Hill's Pet Products division, which Colgate is retaining from its former Riviana rice business.

Hill's markets special pet foods and supplement products through veterinarians, breeders and pet stores, and last year it introduced the Science Diet growth line for kittens and relaunched a maintenance diet for adult cats.

Princess House Crystal Collection introduced 16 new products last year, chiefly through its party-plan, direct sales approach.

Sales increased 11% last year, with measured media spending of only $379,800, 90% of that in network tv. This May, Colgate expanded its direct-marketing gift business with the purchase of Hexham, U.K.-based Fiesta, a party-plan company also marketing crystal, china and giftware.

The new CPL Industries unit, part of the specialty marketing division, is a combination of Colgate's existing Sterno Products division with last year's acquisition of the St. Laurent Cos. CPL markets a complete line of cleaning products, canned cooking fuel and equipment, and nonwoven industrial wipes to the hotel, restaurant and institutional markets.

Adolph Coors Co. continued expansion into new territory in 1985 and the first part of 1986—eight states and Canada—enabled the brewer to increase sales during a sluggish time for the beer industry.

During the first half of 1985, Coors entered Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Vermont, and it added Michigan in the first quarter of 1986. Only five states—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Indiana and Delaware—remain to be penetrated. In October, Coors began distributing Coors and Coors Light in Canada through a licensing agreement with Molson Breweries Ltd.

Such geographic expansion enabled Coors to boost its barrelage by 11.8%, while total domestic-beer shipments in 1985 increased less than 1%, and barrelage was down for four of the top-six breweries. The only other major beer marketer to increase shipments was market leader Anheuser-Busch.

An estimated 1 million barrels of Coors' 1.55 million-barrel increase went into New England and Illinois, new territory during 1985, according to John Collopy, beer business analyst and first vp of Robert W. Baird & Co., a Milwaukee brokerage company. "I don't think their sales will go up by 12% in 1986 like they did in 1985. Without geographic expansion, they'd have to gain it in market share."

"Considering that they were only in 17 states a decade ago, of course they've gained as they've expanded. But there's nowhere else to go," says Donald Rice, vp and senior investment analyst at Blunt, Ellis & Loewi, a Milwaukee brokerage company. "Now we'll all wait and see."

Coors found its most fertile new territory in New England. It has captured 20% of the market in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, according to Beer Marketer's Insights. By March, 1986, the average market share in Coors' six New England states had settled at 12.3%, according to Coors' figures; considerably higher than the brewery's national average market share of 7.9%.

Coors takes as a positive sign, however, that sales also appear to have improved in established markets. In Texas and California, for example, slippage had been partly attributed to a six-year boycott by the Hispanic community. Coors ended that boycott when it signed a Hispanic trade covenant on Oct. 29, 1984, and 1985 was the first year the results of that pact were apparent in the marketplace. Frank Solis, manager of the national Hispanic program for Coors, says that in 1984 Hispanics counted for only 4% of Coors' business. Under the trade covenant, Mr. Solis says that in 1985 business with the Hispanic community jumped to 9% of Coors' total sales.

"Sales were up in California last year for the first time in a number of years," says Rob Klugman, vp-marketing for Coors. "We consider that significant in turning around a trend in our base market of the western states. The trend during 1985 was still down in Texas, although during the first quarter of 1986 it was up for the year to date. Clearly, we're getting Hispanic business in California. That's not as clear in Texas."

Earlier in 1984, Coors also signed a trade covenant with the black community in an effort to head off a black boycott threat. During 1985 Coors ran a series of radio minidocumentaries on black history in the Southeast. Dayn-Mark, Atlanta, created the spots as a one-time project. In December, 1985, Coors assigned its black consumer advertising account, estimated at $6 million to $8 million annually, to Uni-World Group, New York.

Earlier boycotts were recalled when Coors moved into Michigan, its only new territory so far in 1986. The national AFL-CIO never dropped a boycott it began in 1977, and when Coors entered the state, the labor group opened a state boycott.

"We're well ahead of our plan in Michigan," Mr. Klugman says, "but the opposition hasn't helped us." He says the boycott has disrupted Coors' distribution in the highly unionized state.

Mr. Rice doubts Coors ever will perform well in the upper Midwest. His figures show Coors with only a 1.4% market share in Wisconsin in March, 1986. He attributes the low share not only to what he called Coors' "anti-labor image" but also to the heavy concentration of breweries based in the area, which fosters brand loyalty and makes it harder for an outsider.

At the brewery, optimism is running high that sales will continue to climb.

Mr. Klugman says the brewery expects another record year in 1986, notes that sales during the first quarter of 1986 are up by 11.3% for the year to date. That optimism was reflected in the groundbreaking Nov. 16, 1985, for a second brewery near Elkton, Va. The plant initially will serve as a packaging facility when its first phase of construction is completed in spring 1987. Eventual capacity of the $500 million plant is 10 million bbls. a year.

Heady optimism is not the rule everywhere. Mr. Collopy, for example, points out that Coors' 1985 gains followed down years in 1981 and 1984. He notes that for the past five years Coors' compound average gain is about 1%—only slightly better than growth for the entire industry during that time.

However, Joseph Frazzano, brewing industry analyst for Oppenheimer in New York, sees the company at the beginning of a genuine upswing, noting particularly the success of recent marketing efforts and continued strength of Coors Light.

"Coors Light is going well, and Coors is continuing a policy of spending more per barrel on promotion than any other brewer—about $10 a barrel compared with Anheuser-Busch, which spends about $5 or $6," Mr. Frazzano says. "It's a policy that works for them, and when something works in this industry, it usually works for five or 10 years."

The "Silver Bullet" continues to move up the market-share charts, going from the No. 10 position among all national brews in 1984 to No. 7 (with a 3.2% share) in 1985. Mr. Klugman predicts Coors Light "could win up in fifth or sixth position" in 1986.

In September, 1985, Coors broke the "Silver Bullet Bar" campaign for Coors Light, created by Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago. The commercials are Coors' second "serial" type spot. Sensing a winner, Coors boosted measured advertising for Coors Light by more 70% during 1985, to $19.1 million.

In July, 1986, Coors began running a test "Silver Bullet Bar" commercial on the networks in which the bartender takes the car keys from an inebriated consumer. It is the first "don't drink and drive" spot aired by a brewer.

Coors, the flagship brand at Adolph Coors, dropped slightly in market share during 1985, going from 5% in 1984 to 4.7% in 1985. The brand remained in fourth place nationally, behind Budweiser, Lite beer from Miller and Miller High Life. Coors broke its highly touted "Coors is the One" campaign, a low-key pitch by actor Mariette Hartley in February, 1985. The new campaign, which, like the "Silver Bullet Bar," uses a "to be continued" theme, was supported by Coors' first national print buy. Measured spending for Coors also was heavily boosted, rising by 59.6%, to $33.2 million in 1985.

Measured spending on combined advertising for Coors and Coors Light dropped by 9%, to $3.5 million in 1985.

Market expansion efforts also include new brands. The company toyed briefly with Colorado Chiller, a malt-based beverage that entered test market July 1, 1985, in San Diego; Orlando, Fla.; Charlotte, N.C.; Dayton, O.; Lubbock, Tex., and Spokane, Wash. The product was withdrawn from the market Oct. 22, although the brewery says it remains "committed to having a competitive product in the segment."

In August, 1985, Coors formed a joint venture with Molson Breweries of Canada and Kaltenberg Castle Brewery of West Germany to form Masters Brewing Co. to launch Masters III beer. After a four-city test, the joint venture closed down July 31, 1986.

Although Masters III is the product of a company independent of Coors, as a superpremium it is positioned directly against Coors' Herman Joseph's, which remained in limited distribution during 1985. Perhaps by coincidence, in 1985 Coors did virtually nothing to promote Herman Joseph's. Measured advertising dropped off the charts, $1.2 million had been spent promoting the brand in 1984. The brewer eliminated the Herman Joseph's brand manager position, consolidating it with the George Killian's Irish Red Ale brand manager's job.

Coors demonstrated continued support for two other brand extensions, George Killian's Irish Red Ale and Coors Extra Gold. During 1985 and early 1986, Coors extended the markets for Killian's into New England, Florida and Virginia. Measured spending for the "Killian's Red, loosened" campaign, which was created by FCB, rose only slightly, to $396,600 in 1985.

Coors first unveiled Coors Extra Gold in April, 1985, as a heavier brew positioned against Budweiser. Test markets at that time were in selected cities in California, Colorado, Idaho, Nevada and New Mexico. During 1986, Coors expanded the Extra Gold test into Idaho Falls, Pocatello and Soda Springs, Ida. Measured spending on Extra Gold during 1985 came to $632,500.

During 1985, the advertising account for Cocomo, a nonchocolate candy bar that was being test-marketed in Kansas, disappeared off the Evans/Bartholomew roster. Cocomo is a product of Coors Food Products, one of the brewery's 22 subsidiary companies. Ketchum Advertising, San Francisco, handled a confidential project for Coors Food Products during 1985. Any current Food Products advertising is being handled in-house.

Cosmair Inc. kept up a robust spending pattern in advertising in 1985 to keep its brands competitive in three major areas: Hair color, department store cosmetics and mass marketed beauty products.

Privately held Cosmair is the U.S. licensee for L'Oreal and Lancome. Swiss conglomerate Nestle SA owns 62% of Cosmair, with the remainder divided among L'Oreal interests. Although earnings are closely guarded, analysts believe profits are hindered by heavy spending needed to keep brands flourishing in the brutally competitive beauty industry.

Based on North American sales figures, Cosmair is the third largest beauty company in the $10 billion cosmetics arena. It trails Avon, which has $1.61 billion in sales, and Revlon (owned by Pantry Pride) with $[illegible] million, reports Nancy Hall, equity research analyst at Prudential-Bache. Estee Lauder is a close fourth with estimated sales of $500 million in North America.

Cosmair outspends many of its foes, Avon, for example, spent about $25 million in measured media while Estee Lauder's measured spending came in at $46.8 million, according to Leading National Advertisers. In the beauty business, where promotional activities such as gift-with-purchase and demonstrations are crucial, spending is heavy in unmeasured media.

Print advertising gained favor last year with Cosmair's newspaper and magazine spending rising 12.5% to $27 mills. There was also an increased interest toward network cable instead of network and spot tv. This was fueled by the launch of Studio Line, a styling mousse, gel and directional spray targeted at the music video generation and advertised on MTV Music Television. Cosmair spent $682,000 on network cable compared with only $56,000 in 1984, according to LNA.

Cosmair consists of seven major divisions: L'Oreal retail hair care; L'Oreal retail cosmetics; retail fragrances; Lancome; Biotherm; designer fragrances, and L'Oreal salon division.

The single greatest spending on one line in 1985 was the $12 million in measured spending behind the relaunch of L'Oreal Preference hair color. The company sought to put a charge in the stagnant $400 million hair color business by repackaging Preference. For the retailers, L'Oreal devised a fixture that allowed a lock of hair to be clipped to the shelf so customers could see the color. The trade estimated sales rose as much as 30%.

But Bristol Myers' Clairol, which controls 60% of the business, was prepared to do battle. Clairol rolled out nationwide Ultrasse, a gel-based permanent hair color promoted by actress Linda Evans. In the midst of this, L'Oreal also introduced Avantage, a semipermanent hair coloring targeted at the same customers using Clairol's Loving Care. L'Oreal spent $5.3 million in measured media dollars behind Avantage; but the total costs of spreading the word inched closer to $6 million. The launch included 2 million $2 cash refunds and more than 70 million free offers.

Retailers say Avantage has not put a dent in Clairol's Loving Care's 12% share of market. In total, L'Oreal's three hair colors—Preference, Avantage and Excellence—control about 27% of hair color dollar sales. The picture does not look brighter for 1986 because hair color unit growth is hovering at only 2%, according to industry consultant Allan G. Mottus.

Many marketers are using temporary colored mousses as a ploy to introduce younger users to color. Although L'Oreal pioneered the mousse explosion in the U.S., it has held back on a color mousse. In 1986, it will introduce a slightly different product line, Zazu hair cosmetics. McCann-Erickson will handle the estimated $10 million launch.

L'Oreal remains the leader in the $175 million mousse market, although its one-time 30% share has dipped to 18.5%, according to Ms. Hall of Prudential-Bache. The company sought to counter the plethora of new mousse products eroding its share by debuting the Studio Line mousse and gel with a $9 million ad budget. Market leaders currently are L'Oreal's Free Hold with 18.5% and Albegto Culver with 15.5%, and Helene Curtis' Suave with 12%. Between Free Hold and Studio Line, L'Oreal hopes to gain 40% of the business.

Last year was also the year L'Oreal made its brassiest move yet in the $1.4 billion mass market decorative cosmetics business. After successfully repackaging its eye shadows, lipsticks and nail enamels, L'Oreal charged ahead with Visuelle makeup. Backed with more than $10 million in advertising support, Visuelle had a slow start, but is now a significant brand with about a 3% share of market.

In all mass market color cosmetics, L'Oreal continues to battle leader Revlon. L'Oreal now has 11% of the market. Revlon used to outsell L'Oreal 5 to 1, now the ratio is 3 to 1.

L'Oreal spent nearly $19 million in measured media backing all its cosmetics, and $5.3 million was spent on nail enamel alone. This year, L'Oreal is sinking money into its new L'Oreal Single eye shadows. L'Oreal singles' launch should enable Cosmair eye shadow to become more competitive with Revlon's 25% share and Maybelline's 18% share. L'Oreal currently has a 10% share.

Cosmair has adopted a sampling technique using the concept of microencapsulation, which was the catalyst behind the success of scents such as Giorgio. The process allows the color to be transfered to paper, such as an ad insert. The consumer can scratch the paper and get a sample of the color.

L'Oreal also recently announced plans to use Andie MacDowell as a spokeswoman for L'Oreal cosmetics.

As L'Oreal continues to make a bigger splash in mass markets, sister company Lancome enjoys its strong franchise with department store shoppers. Lancome, with estimated sales of $200 million, has an 8.7% share of the [illegible], behind Estee Lauder's 21.3%, Clinique's 15.2%. Lancome gained more than a share point in 6 thanks in great part, according to Mottus, to the guidance of Joe Ar[illegible] exec vp, president of Cosmair. Sp[illegible]ing behind Lancome is consid[illegible] rather modest for its industry—$ million. This suggests Lancome [illegible] become so popular that it wills [illegible] self.

Grabbing the promotional ball[illegible] as Cosmair is Biotherm, a 25-year[illegible] purchased by Cosmair in 1969. [illegible] than $13 million was pumped be[illegible] Biotherm, according to LNA.

In department stores, all Cos[illegible] firms generate about 15% of total [illegible] metics dollar business. However, [illegible] mair announced in 1985 that it [illegible] drop its Ralph Lauren cosmetics [illegible] in order to concentrate on other [illegible] sesses. Cosmair acquired Laure[illegible] part of its $146 million purchase [illegible] 1984 of Warner Cosmetics, which [illegible] produces Vanderbilt perfume.

Vanderbilt continues to be the [illegible] of Cosmair's fragrance stable. The [illegible] million brand was the fastest [illegible] fragrance in drugstores for the [illegible] year is a row. Vanderbilt cost [illegible] roughly 4% of the drug store mass [illegible] fragrance business. The total Van[illegible]bilt line was supported with about [illegible] million in measured spending.

Recently, Cosmair sought to pr[illegible]ns turf with Vanderbilt via a [illegible] charging trademark infringement [illegible] unfair competition against S.C. J[illegible]son & Son. S.C. John[illegible] had to add new labeling and an ad[illegible] tising disclaimer to the L'Eevie [illegible] Even so, trade sources believe Van[illegible]bilt's life span has already been ca[illegible] other knockoffs, particularly the [illegible] selling Giorgio smell-alike, Primo!

Polo and Chaps—two Cosmair [illegible] grances—continue to control a h[illegible] share of the men's market. Spen[illegible] was about even for each brand in [illegible] vs. 1984—$3.5 million and $2.3 [illegible] lion, respectively.

Sources say Cosmair will debut [illegible] fragrances in 1987, including No[illegible] ous, which will be backed with a $ $20 million ad budget. Cosm[illegible] dropped plans for a Norma Ka[illegible] line.

Although Cosmair has enabled itself as a major contender in all [illegible] retailing sectors, it has undergone [illegible] eral shakeups. Cotter & Co., an 8,000 member-owned cooperative and the largest hardware wholesaler (True Value Hardware) in the U.S., maintained its slow growth pattern in 1985 as many areas of the hardware and do-it-yourself businesses came under financial pressure.

Moving into 1986, Cotter reported first-quarter sales, ended March 31, were up 0.7% to $407.6 million over the corresponding period in 1985. Earnings were down 11%, to $9.95 million, although the drop was "not unusual for the first quarter," according to Edward Lanctot, Cotter's secretary, treasurer, advertising and merchandising manager.

With annual U.S. hardware store sales pegged at $10.2 billion and growing—in August, 1986, sales were $853 million, up 4% from the prior year—Cotter's $1.7 billion sales total in 1985 gave it a 16.6% share of market in dollars. The biggest Cotter rival is Ace Hardware Corp., Oakbrook, Ill., with a 10.2% market share. Ace, with 6,000 dealers, had sales that topped $1 billion in calendar 1985, for the first time in its 61-year history. No. 3 is Fort Wayne, Ind.-based Hardware Wholesaler Inc., or HWI, with a 5% share. Founded in 1945, HWI has more than 2,600 members, operates in 35 states and had estimated sales of about $600 million in 1985.

Terrence Gallagher, editor of Hardware Age, says Cotter's competitors are closing the gap. As Ace hardware reached the $1 billion sales mark last December, Ace president Lawrence R. Gavin predicted the company would "hit our second billion just eight years from now."

In the five-year period including 1985, Cotter's total sales have climbed steadily, while net earnings have been more uneven, reaching $65 million in 1981 but then falling in an up-down cycle until 1985, when earnings climbed to $66.6 million.

As shown by Cotter and its two major competitors, hardware selling, both wholesale and retail, contradicts a half century of marketing trends toward failure of the independent store confronted by the big chains. Even with the heavy hard-line marketing efforts by Sears, Roebuck & Co.; Montgomery Ward & Co.; J C Penney Co.; K mart Corp. and others, local hardware stores continue to survive, apparently because of their heavy emphasis on individual service.

The business has not been without its volatility. The biggest U.S. independent hardware distributor, Belknap Inc., a Humana Corp. subsidiary based in Louisville, declared bankruptcy in January and shut down. Service Merchandise's Mr. HOW chain has put a hold on the planned opening of new stores after poor economic conditions forced it to sell five existing ones. W.R. Grace Co. is selling its retail business, including 317 home centers and hardware stores such as Handy City, Orchard Supply Hardware and House Works.

There is considerable industry consolidation. Handy Andy and K mart's Builders Square are expanding through acquisition, and in recent months, a number of top producers among hard lines have fended off takeovers from companies like Black & Decker Corp., Toro Co. and Champion Spark Plug Co.

The Cotter & Co. co-op consists of more than 8,000 True Value hardware stores, including 840 combination True Value Hardwares and Cotter's sister store line, V&S (for "value and service") Variety Stores, and an additional 920 V&S stores. V&S outlets supply lower-priced personal and home goods.

The company's biggest concentrations are in Illinois and California, each with 7% of the total stores; Texas, with 6%; Pennsylvania and New York, each 5%, and Wisconsin, Michigan and Ohio, with about 4% each.

Of Cotter's full merchandise line in 1985, hardware made up 39.5% of the total supplied to members; home and maintenance supplies were 31.8%; variety goods, 19.5%, and appliances, 9.2%. In addition to buying from many suppliers, Cotter manufactures many owners, who do not give Cotter exclusivity, a system also adhered to by member-owners of Ace and HWI. On average, 50% of member-owners' purchases are from co-op headquarters.

In advertising, the national media support—all for True Value hardware—is funded by manufacturers' payments to Cotter, proportional to the wholesaler's purchases. Tv ad presenters include sports announcer Pat Summerall and commentator Paul Harvey. Harry Caray, announcer for the Chicago Cubs games on independent station WGN-TV, also speaks for Cotter, and Chicago Bear Mike Singletary will be joining the group. Network tv commercials for True Value are scheduled for National Football League games, pro bowling and NBC's "Today."

Cotter spends most of its measured advertising on True Value Stores—$43.8 million in 1985, up 7% from 1984, according to Leading National Advertisers. Network tv, spot tv and network radio are the big media ticket items, and cable entered for the first time in 1985 with $1.5 million in measured spending.

Cotter provides local dealer-members ad support based on orders with Cotter. Cotter also pays back to members yearend patronage dividends, 20% to 30% in cash and the rest in interest paid on subordinated notes. In 1985, such dividends totaled $90.5 million, including about $67.5 million for merchandise shipments, direct mail advertising and insurance and $23 million for interest and other payments.

Cotter also is moving to advance its variety line, V&S Variety Stores, by involving V&S in national advertising once V&S member-owners' volume buys from Cotter warehouses justify the expense. The company describes 1985 for V&S as "respectable but unexciting." V&S carries a lower-priced line and is big on toys, school supplies, notions and hardware and tools. "V&S gives us a chance to serve some rural areas where we'll have a combination hardware and variety store," Mr. Lanctot says.

Cotter produced about 200 million direct mail catalogs a year, ranging in size from 12 to 64 pages and produced 12 times a year for True Value Hardware and about four times for V&S Variety. Dealers are free to pick the size (number of pages) of each flier, then imprint their name on a blank cover panel and mail or hand-deliver them within a five- to 10-mile radius of their store. Home Products Marketing, Cotter's in-house shop, handles design, copy, photography and artwork.

Cotter operates out of 15 regional office and warehouse-distribution centers. Another warehouse is in planning stages for the Ocala, Fla., area.

CPC International, hurt in recent years by the appreciation of the dollar in foreign markets that generate 58% of total sales, is beginning to place more emphasis on product development stateside as a hedge against its heavy reliance on international markets.

And while 1986 results to date do not reflect this increased activity, returns for the first two quarters show marked increases in sales and earnings traced largely to a downward swing in the dollar.

Worldwide grocery products sales at CPC suffered a 1.3% decline in sales although operating income increased 5.2% to $322 million. CPC's total operating income was $358.5 million, down 6.6%, with the grocery products accounting for 60% of total sales and 90% of operating income. The food division accounted for virtually all CPC's ad expenditures.

The Best Foods division is responsible for grocery product sales in North America, and markets Hellmann's and Best Foods mayonnaise, Knorr soup mix, Mazola oils and margarine, Mueller pasta, Skippy peanut butter, Thomas' English muffins and Karo Syrup, among its leading products.

CPC also operates a corn wet-milling operation, which manufactures corn sweeteners, starches and other corn derivatives. The segment recorded an 8% drop in sales and a decline of 49.7% in operating income to $41.2 million.

A small diversified segment, which produced chemicals, resins and foundry materials, showed an operating income decline of 2.7% to $7.1 million, on sales that grew 5.3% to $166.1 million.

Worldwide, CPC spent $200 million in advertising and promotion in 1985, up 5.3% from 1984. CPC derived 58% of its sales and 52% of its operating income from abroad. The relative strength of the dollar against major currencies has hurt sales and earnings. Major foreign markets are Germany, the U.K., France, Brazil, Italy and Canada.

For the second quarter of 1986, the company reported net income of $48.8 million, up 15%, on sales of $1.13 billion, up 6%. Similar improvements were reported in the first quarter.

James Eiszner, CPC president-ceo, noted at the stockholders meeting this spring that the quarterly increase after three years of indifferent performances, were mainly because of the stronger foreign currencies. CPC's grocery products business, for example, posted a 6% increase in North America in 1985, 39% increase in Latin America and 4% in Europe. But operations in Asia and Africa declined 32%, primarily because of weak currency values.

CPC has begun to stress building market share in the U.S., given its sensitivities to the decline and fall of the dollar. In 1986, two new products were introduced in test markets, a light mayonnaise under the Hellmann's and Best Food labels (Best Foods is marketed in western states) and Pasta Cuisine packaged dinners, under CPC's Mueller's Pasta Products label. Initial sales of the two products are positive, says Robert T. Viscardi, CPC advertising director.

Marketing of CPC's popular Thomas' English muffins, was expanded to 73% of the nation in 1985. CPC also introduced a tamper-evident shrink-wrap band for Skippy peanut butter and Hellmann's and Best Foods mayonnaise, in response to expressions of increasing consumer interests.

For individual food products, Hellmann's and Best Foods mayonnaise sales increased 8% in the U.S. during 1985, with combined market share increasing from 43% to 44%. Mazola corn oil gained 13% in U.S. sales during the year despite the nationwide marketing of Beatrice's Hunt-Wesson Foods' Wesson corn oil. Mr. Viscardi says the company's corn oil share increased in 1985 from 15.4% to 16.8%.

Domestic sales of Knorr soups, sauces, bouillons, seasons and mixes increased substantially, but sales are still relatively small in the U.S. compared with Europe and Latin America. Worldwide, Knorr products showed $620 million in sales.

Bread spreads and cheese accounted for $290 million sales worldwide. Skippy peanut butter showed a small increase in domestic sales, as did Mazola corn oil margarine, while the lower-priced Nucoa margarine declined in sales in the U.S.

CPC's pasta and bakery products—a $250 million business worldwide—include Mueller's pasta products and Thomas' English muffins and other Thomas products in the U.S.

The latter showed a 3% increase in 1985 sales, while Mueller's spaghetti, macaroni and other pasta products increased sales 5%. Both Thomas' and Mueller's lead in U.S. market shares.

Among other grocery products, Argo and Kingsford's starches, Karo syrup, and Niagara spray starch are leaders in their markets.

Measured advertising of CPC's leading food products dropped 5.4% to $33 million in 1985. Despite increased competition, Mazola corn oil advertising decreased 3% to $4.5 million.

Skippy peanut butter advertising also dropped 15.8% to $8 million.

Network and spot tv expenditures showed a dramatic drop, with network expenditures down 14% to $5.6 million, and spot tv off 40% to $1.8 million. Despite its expanded distribution in 1985, Thomas' English muffins ad expenditures dropped 17.5% to $5.2 million. Thomas' spending is virtually all in spot tv. Karo syrup advertising, all in magazines, also decreased 18.8% to $1.3 million.

Best Foods mayonnaise advertising dropped 8.3% to $1.1 million. Advertising for Hellmann's increased 12.3% to $9.1 million and amounted to a media mix shuffle. Magazine spending fell 18.8% to $1.3 million, and spot tv dropped 56.1% to $790,000 as network tv ballooned 106% to $7 million.

Knorr's soup mixes increased advertising from $421,000 in 1984 to $2 million last year, mainly in magazines, which showed an increase from $365,000 to $1.8 million. Expenditures of Mueller's pasta products—all in spot tv for both 1984 and 1985—increased 6.3% to $1.7 million.

With 1985 advertising down, in total, for these major products, the increased 1985 ad expenditures mainly came from joint product advertising, such as Hellmann's mayonnaise and Lipton soup mix or in smaller product lines such as Rit dyes.

CPC's genealogy

Through its product line, CPC International traces its roots to 1838 when C.H. Knorr (soups) was founded in Heilbronn, Germany. In 1842, Thomas Kingsford found the first practical means for separating starch from corn and set up Brown & Polson in Britain. Corn Products Refining Co. (now CPC), formed stateside in 1906 through the merger of leading corn processors, brought out Mazola corn oil in 1911, Hellmann's mayonnaise in 1912. In 1955, Rosefield Packing Co., maker of Skippy peanut butter, was acquired by CPC. Best Foods.

Its Ultra 21 ovenware inaugurated in a $10 million tv paign in the previous year, is the r growth factor. Five new prodtwo toys and new color lines were d during the year. The line was d out in Japan last year, and the pany plans to focus on the interonal market in 1986, introducing venware line in Europe and Aus-

&K grew in 1985 by acquisition, hasing five foodservice or foodpcts companies: Everest Group, Australian producer of pasta, ice m and frozen dinners; Westman mission Co., a Denver-based food ice company for the Rocky Moun-area; Seaboard Foods, a breadistributor based in Rocky Mount, ; LBJ Institutional Supply, a nix-based foods distributor; S.S. ce Co., a Glenview, Ill.-based lservice company. D&K also ght Dynacharge, the Canadian-d battery brand name that will be for Duracell's Canadian products, igned letters of intent to purchase ri Produce, a broad-line foodserdistributor in San Diego; and Sage h of Des Plaines, Ill., considered rgest national distributor of foodce products to the airline indus-

D&K also bought majority control in the Italian cheese company Invenizzi S.p.A and entered into an agreement with the San Francisco French Bread Co. to develop a frozen-bread product line. The company says it will continue to pursue foodservice companies in the Kansas City, Chicago, Phoenix and New York areas. The company also hopes to use its expanding foodservice outlets to broaden its distribution of Lender's bagels and Celestial Seasonings herb teas. Food service currently accounts for 13% of all D&K sales.

The company also did some housecleaning in 1985, completing its sale of KitchenAid to Whirlpool for an after-tax gain of $41 million after a year of antitrust hearings. D&K also divested itself of most of its small healthcare operations like Absorbent Cotton Co., Delta Medical, Sterile Products and Seamless Hospital Products. The company also sold its small business interests in Brazil.

D&K's heavy food-line expansion carried over into 1985. New Rocker n' Rollers macaroni and sauce mix was added to the Kraft dinners line. Pourable cheese toppings, introduced in the Denver and San Francisco areas, and VegiSnax, cell culture-grown carrot and celery snacks that are crispier than ordinary vegetables, entered the market in early 1986. Miracle Whip in a 15-oz. squeezable bottle and Real mayonnaise were introduced in northern Indiana. A six-item line of Sauceworks and Kraft Light naturals reduced-fat cheeses and Presto Italian pourable salad dressing that does not separate after shaking were rolled out nationally.

D&K discontinued its Cheese Classics frozen side-dish line after 15 months of testing in the Southwest. The 10 entrees were pulled because of poor distribution.

D&K's acquisition in July of this year of Medford, Wis.-based Tombstone Pizza Corp. ensured Kraft's presence in the freezer case. Tombstone, which has a 10% share of the national $834 frozen pizza market, plans to expand distribution of its Tombstone and Double-Top brands and introduce new products in the coming year.

Celestial Seasonings, acquired by D&K two years ago, increased its market share 10 percentage points to 50% of the $90 million herbal tea market. According to analysts, no company emerged as a clear-cut No. 2 in the market. Thomas J. Lipton Inc., whose black-tea market is growing at only a few percentage points a year, brought out its own brand of herbal tea.

Celestial Seasonings added four flavors and broadened distribution channels and marketing programs in 1985. Since its buyout, Celestial has doubled its ad budget to nearly $1.5 million. And in 1986, it plans to introduce new lines of fruit-flavored and after-dinner teas. Because of these "business-building investments" profits were off, according to the company.

D&K's other star acquisition of 1984, Lender's bagels, gave a strong performance last year. Despite the introduction of competitor Sara Lee's Bagel Time bagels, Lender's captured more than 80% of the $70 million market. The company spent nearly $6 million on advertising in 1985.

Kraft's dairy group had a substantially better year than in 1984, reporting a 10% volume gain (excluding fluid milk). Representing 9% of total Kraft sales, this group began phasing out its poorly performing fluid milk business last year.

This segment's strongest performers were its ice creams, with all brands reporting significant tonnage increases. Frusen Gladje has tripled sales since its acquisition by Kraft in early 1985, picking up more force in the superpremium category. It is the No. 2 superpremium brand with an 18% share of the relatively small market. Breyer's all-natural line did well with its expansion into nine western states. The No. 1 over-all ice cream with 8% of the total market, Breyer's has an 11% share in its distribution area.

Celebrating its 50th anniversary, Sealtest brand reported a 16% volume increase. It also introduced its Cubic Scoops flavors. The company's Polar B'ar Squares also introduced two new flavors—peanut butter crunch and heavenly hash. But the future of Polar B'ar is in question following Kraft's removal of the product from the market. Kraft shut down production when the product was found to contain harmful bacteria. A $12 million pretax charge for removal-related expenses was reported by the company for the first quarter in 1986. The company and the Food & Drug Administration continue to investigate.

Kraft spent $28.6 million on Velveeta brand products in 1985, up 33.6%, and representing the largest expenditure by Kraft on a brand in 1985. It backed Miracle Whip salad dressing with $17 million in measured media, up 44%, helping make Miracle Whip No. 1 in the viscous dressing market with a 33% share. Together with Miracle Whip mayonnaise, which has a 15% share of the mayonnaise market, the two brands almost double the share of CPC International's No. 2 ranked Hellmann's, which has a 27% market share.

The most dramatic increase in ad spending for one product in 1985 was for Kraft natural cheeses. Measured support for the product in 1984 was nearly $10 million; in 1985 that more than doubled to nearly $21 million. The company reported higher profitability in this category—mostly as a result of its "strategically focused region-by-region sales program" during the second half of the year.

The consumer products and commercial products divisions, consisting of Duracell, West Bend, Health Care and KitchenAid, accounted for 13.2% of D&K's total sales and 9.3% of operating profit.

Duracell, the leading producer of high-performance consumer batteries, continued to edge out Eveready with a 48% market share. Combined with Eveready's 42% share, the two companies combined account for 90% of the market. Both companies spent less last year on advertising for the first time in two years. Duracell spent nearly $25.4 million and Eveready about $27.6 million when it was owned by Union Carbide. It since has been sold to Ralston Purina. In 1984, Duracell outspent Eveready $28.6 million to $22 million, according to Leading National Advertisers. Despite its control of the market, Duracell's profit's declined because of investments and research. In September, Duracell introduced a new line of alkaline batteries that last 30% longer than its regular batteries.

West Bend Co. also reported profit losses in 1985 because of a soft housewares industry. West Bend did best with its Precor and Total Gym physical equipment line and Chicago-based Borg-Erickson Corp.'s bathroom scales. These products are riding the wave of what by the end of the decade will be a $2.5 billion market, according to the company. West Bend also plans to introduce a space-saving toaster/oven/broiler, Oven Up, this year.

D&K consolidated its network tv buying responsibilities totaling $100 million at Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago. Previously, daytime buys were handled by Needham Harper Worldwide and prime-time and network specials were managed by J. Walter Thompson USA. N W Ayer, New York, continues to handle all spot tv buys. Kraft also shifted its $1 million low-calorie pourable dressing account to Needham Harper Worldwide from JWT to ease the workload.

With a new three-year pilots' co tract that helped bring its high lab costs under control and one of t healthiest balance sheets in the indu try, Delta Air Lines is ready to take o The big question is, where is De headed?

For the 1977-85 period, the carr generated $3.5 billion in cash flo from operations, while capital expe ditures totaled $4.2 billion. Delt cash flow from operations cover 82% of its capital expenditures, a su nor cash flow-to-capital ratio. In co parison, the airline industry as a wh generated $20.5 billion in cash flo from operations over the same perio which provided 62% of the $33 billion spent on capital expenditur according to Salomon Brothers.

But Delta has been criticized f being too conservative in not using financial power to expand its ro system, says Louis Marckesano, vp-nior transportation analyst with Je ney Montgomery Scott, Philadelph There have been rumors that Delta looking for an acquisition or mer partner.

"The future of this industry is five six supercarriers who go just abo everywhere," Mr. Marckesano sa "But 95% of Delta's flights are eas the Mississippi." Delta did make $18.7 million cash tender offer in m August, 1986, for Jet America Airlin a small West Coast carrier. Howev Jet America had already agreed to buyout from Alaska Air Group In generating speculation that De might be attempting to buy Alas Air.

Delta, which increased advertisi less than 1% in 1985 from the previo year, made substantial shifts in m sured spending from newspaper to Agency BDA/BBDO, Atlanta, us variations of the "Delta gets you the tune for the spots.

Measured spot tv spending jumpe 23% in 1985 to $13.4 million to b come the second leading spending c egory. Network tv spending jumpe 40% for the year to $6.1 million, a Delta spent an additional $4.7 milli on cable tv in 1985. Newspapers co tinued to be Delta's biggest measu spending category in 1985, but fell $17.2 million for the year, down 33% from 1984. Out-of-home media spe ing increased to $1.8 million in 19 up 16%.

was related to the introduction of the new corporate campaign. For the remainder of 1985 and the first six months of 1986, Delta has concentrated on spot tv and cable. Cable spending, for example, increased substantially in 1985 from its level of less than $1 million in 1984, he says.

The decline in newspaper spending was related to a reevaluation of ad linage needs and competitive factors in each market, he adds. "We didn't set out to cut newspaper spending, we just wanted a better mix of media."

A key factor in reevaluating media spending was intense air fare competition in the final six months of 1985 and through the first six months of 1986, Mr. Porter says. "There were so many fare changes [by competitors] that we just stopped advertising fares, [which reduced the importance of more immediate newspaper spending and favored spot tv]. Our strategy was to keep the Delta name in front of the public and to let them know that we offer competitive fares," he says. "We try not to get into fare wars. We match fares where it makes good economic sense. Obviously, if everybody jumps, you have to, too."

Such was the case in March, 1986, when several carriers, including Delta's archrival Eastern Airlines, drastically cut fares to boost traffic. Eastern, in particular, attacked Delta with a two-week, $8 million tv blitz publicizing systemwide spring and summer discounts of up to 75% off regular coach. Miami-based Eastern parodied Delta's tv campaigns using the theme "Eastern gets you there for a whole lot less." Bookings at Eastern were up by 50% over the similar period last year, the company reports. Eastern broadened its fare attack to People Express on routes between the Northeast and Florida, using the theme "Fly smarter," a jab at People's "Fly smart" campaign.

The 1986 fare skirmishes have boosted Delta's traffic, but dampened its earnings in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1986. Delta's total revenues for this period fell 4.7% to $4.46 billion. Intense fare competition caused net income to fall 82% to $47.3 million in fiscal 1986, from $259.5 million in 1985.

Analysts predict airline fares gradually will increase through the end of 1986, however. Although fares fell by 11.3% in June, 1986, several major carriers increased fares by $5 to $10 in more than a third of their markets, according to Salomon Brothers. But while fares increase, major carriers also are taking deliveries on new aircraft and refusing to retire old ones as a result of falling fuel costs.

Although lower fares boosted domestic traffic in June, 1986, by 13.4%, capacity additions for the month grew by 26.3%—almost twice as fast—which caused load factors to fall 7.3% to 63.5%. Delta's traffic for the second calendar quarter of 1986 fell 4.7%, while its capacity increased 1%, giving Delta a load factor of 58.6%, down 3.5% from the same period a year earlier.

Analysts say Delta's position is strengthened through 1986 because Eastern is embroiled in financial and labor problems and involved in a takeover by Houston-based Texas Air Corp. By mid-1986, Eastern began cutting back in markets also served by Delta. Eastern is eliminating 12 of 53 daily flights at its Charlotte, N.C., hub, beginning Oct. 1, and plans to sell some aircraft freed by the cuts.

Eastern also dropped Miami-to-London service in July, 1986, at the same time that Delta was expanding flights from Atlanta to Europe. In May, 1986, Delta inaugurated four weekly nonstop flights between Atlanta and Shannon, Ireland, and two weekly one-stops operating between Atlanta and London. In April, 1986, Delta began daily service to Munich and three weekly flights to Stuttgart, via Munich. Delta also offered a variety of vacation packages.

Michael Derchin, airline analyst for New York-based First Boston Corp., says Eastern's retrenchment strategy could strengthen Delta's hand in the Southeast. In addition, the Texas Air takeover will improve Eastern's ability to compete without resorting to drastic fare cuts.

"A healthy Eastern is good for Delta because Eastern would be less likely to engage in kamikaze fare tactics," Mr. Derchin says. "Eastern was one of the industry's big fare cutters this year."

Delta suffers heavily from Eastern's tactics because both carriers are concentrated in southeastern markets. Delta's proportion of air traffic obtained from routes also served by Eastern was 58.5% of total traffic, according to 1984 data by the Civil Aeronautics Board. Delta's next biggest competitor is American Airlines, which overlaps 22.6% of Delta's routes.

But Delta is making moves to expand beyond its eastern base. In March, 1986, Delta reached agreement with Japan Air Lines and Western Airlines to coordinate flight schedules and to offer additional services, such as baggage check-through on overseas and domestic flights. Japan Air is looking for partners that would help it to compete with UAL's United Airlines unit, which acquired Pan Am's Pacific routes in 1985 for $750 million. On May 1, 1986, Hertz Corp., another UAL unit, became the newest participant in Delta's frequent flier program.

In February, Delta expanded its frequent flier program to include Air New Zealand, which makes members eligible for free and reduced-rate travel awards to New Zealand, Australia and the South Pacific. Delta also began offering "Around the World" air fares in March, 1986, in cooperation with Qantas Airways, Singapore Airlines and Thai Airways International.

Domestically, Delta strengthened its Delta Connection feeder network in May, 1986, by purchasing a $16.9 million, 20% stake in Comair Inc., which flies into its Cincinnati hub. Atlantic Southeast Airlines, Ransome Airlines and Rio Airways are the other members of the Delta Connection.

Analysts says Delta is a powerhouse no matter what the competitive factors. Delta ranks as one of the five strongest carriers in the industry, according to an analysis by Salomon Brothers, New York. Delta's average return on equity is among the highest of any domestic carrier. And Delta has conducted one of the industry's most aggressive fleet modernization programs while maintaining low long-term debt.

Mickey Mouse as a promoter of cultural imperialism! Maybe the French have a point, but the Mitterrand government, ogling the 30,000 new jobs that would be created by the planned $1.2 billion Enchanted Kingdom Disney theme park planned outside Paris, put the issue aside in late August, 1986, and reached agreements on substantive matters like tax rates. Full approval is expected in September. Mickey Mouse and other Disney characters, without a doubt have been leading embassadors of American culture worldwide. Mickey, now 58, aside from his films, was seen on Paris streets in 1933 cavorting behind the hands of a wristwatch.

larly. Rereleases of "Pinocchio" and "Fantasia" were money makers, with "Pinocchio" grossing more than $24 million in its showing in the 1984 Christmas season. A 1986-release "Down and Out in Beverly Hills," produced by Disney's Touchstone Films, besides breaking out of the Disney G and GP-mold, grossed $6.6 million in its first five months on the charts.

"Ruthless People," starring Danny DeVito and Bette Midler, has tallied more than $60 million in only two months into its run. "The Great Mouse Detective" had a respectable $22 million in little over a month this summer, and "Flight of the Navigator" released in early August, had $15 million by mid-August. "The Color of Money," starring Paul Newman, will be released later in the year.

Disney returned to network tv in 1985 after a two-year hiatus with a hit situation comedy, "The Golden Girls" on NBC; two Saturday morning animated series, "The Adventures of the Gummi Bears" on NBC and "The Wuzzles" on CBS; "The Disney Sunday Movie" on ABC, and the planned production of 23 one and two-hour original tv movies.

Only 20 months after it began operation, the Disney Channel became profitable in January, 1985, and ended the year with 2.3 million subscribers on more than 2,500 cable systems. The company expects subscriber totals to grow to 2.5 million by the end of 1986. Disney Channel is adding original productions to its 19-hour-a-day schedule.

Another major Disney move in 1985 was the syndication of Disney properties, including 29 years' worth of "The Wonderful World of Disney" and some 500 cartoons, a decision one critic compared to selling the crown jewels, but nevertheless raised more than $40 million in syndication fees in the first month alone.

Buena Vista, Disney's motion picture distribution arm, sold more than 100 titles to tv in Australia and European countries in 1985. And Disney created a new video division to market Disney properties in the burgeoning home video and pay tv markets.

Measured advertising for Disney's Filmed Entertainment Division in 1985 totaled $14.1 million, up from $11 million in 1984. As in 1984, the 1985 advertising was spread nearly equally among magazines, newspapers, and network and spot tv.

Disney's consumer products division showed 1985 operating income up 5% to $56.3 million on a 1% growth in sales. The division introduced Gummi Bears and Wuzzles characters in addition to toys and clothing featuring the traditional Disney characters. Advertising is done essentially by companies licensed to sell some 8,000 products.

Disney's other division, Arvida Disney Corp., had measured advertising of $2.4 million, up from $1.4 million, primarily to promote Disney-owned hotels and resorts in magazines. The division also handles property development for Disney's theme parks and its industrial, commercial and housing developments.

Dow Chemical Co. began to receive benefits in 1985 from the restructuring it began eight years ago to augment the cyclical bulk chemical business with specialty chemicals and services and consumer goods.

Dow gave a further boost to its consumer business in January, 1985, by purchasing the Texize cleaner-product business of Morton Thiokol, doubling the size of its consumer business. The acquisition led to formation of the company's new subsidiary, Dow Consumer Products, based in Indianapolis.

The company also says 1985 was the year its consumer specialties business first began living up to its promise of producing growth, high returns and becoming more recession resistant.

For the quarter ended June 30, 1986, Dow had the best second-quarter net income in its history, at $222 million, 43% higher than the second quarter in 1985. Sales for the quarter were $2.9 billion, down 3% from $3 billion for the same period in 1985.

In the past two years the company has commercialized more products than in any similar period. More can be expected, according to James Wilbur, specialist in analysis of chemicals securities, Smith, Barney, New York: "Dow is an example of preferential allocation of resources as it places emphasis on Texize, the pharmaceuticals and other areas of specialization. Capital should shift toward new areas in the company . . . to pull chemical output into consumer products."

A clear example of this process is the latest major Dow consumer product introduction, Citrucel. Dow's entry of May, 1986, in the $500 million bulk laxative market. Taking on G.D. Searle & Co.'s (now Monsanto Co.'s) long-established Metamucil, orange-flavored Citrucel results from cross-breeding a Dow chemical technology product, methyl cellulose, with the company's newly added pharmaceuticals marketing know-how, supplied by Lakeside Pharmaceuticals Division, Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc., Cincinnati.

In its broad ad campaign, Lakeside aims attention at the difference in texture between Citrucel's "smooth" methyl cellulose texture and what it calls the "gritty" texture of Metamucil.

Marketing promotion is moving under the banner "Great Taste. No Grit" and includes network and spot tv, coupons, free-standing inserts and sampling. Shaller, Rubin & Winer, New York, agency for Merrell Dow's over-the-counter line, handled the campaign. Citrucel is one of many ex amples of "vertical integration" Dow, which is the main producer most of the chemical materials it u to manufacture its more than 1,8 products.

Dow Chemical's worldwide sales $11.54 billion place it second amo chemical companies in the U.S. af Du Pont, which had sales of $2 billion in 1985. It ranks sixth in world. Some 55% of its sales and 4 of plant investment are outside U.S.

While 1985 was a big year for adv tising and acquisitions, it was not bright year for sales and income. Sa were up about 1%, while incon plunged 90%, to $58 million, prim pally because of an average loss of 5 pound on five basic chemical comm dities that total about 10 billion lbs. Dow production annually, and a s cial charge of $592 million to compe sate for slow business in some areas rts basic chemicals and plastics bu nesses.

Included were writeoffs and wri downs of $471 million for plant fac ties, plus staff cuts of 2,700 employ (mostly through voluntary retiremen worth $121 million in wages and oth costs.

When Dow began its restructuri push in 1978, about 15% of its to profits came from consumer and i dustrial specialty products; in 1985 the share is 50%.

The move to specialties shows Dow Chemical's measured media penditures, moving up 103% in 19 Unmeasured advertising spending heavy couponing, samples, direct m and other forms is estimated at $ million for 1985.

Dow Chemical Co. consists of fi main product segments, basic chem cals, basic plastics, industrial speci ties and consumer specialties. In cent years, sales and profits in basic product businesses have been and down; sales and profits of the cialties are generally higher and steeply in the most consumer-focu areas.

Yet Dow says these successes w not divert it from the company's ba foundations in basic chemicals a plastics because Dow's technologi leadership depends on those bu nesses.

What it does mean is that fut growth of the basics will depend reading market demands, not estim ing those future demands.

In 1985, operating profits of basic chemicals segment fell 34% $165 million on a 2% drop in sales. products were caustic soda, wh sales and profits both were down, chlorine compounds, where perf mance was flat. Dow says this segm was hurt by excess world suppli poor prices and foreign imports to U.S.

Basic plastics segment operating come dropped 64.5% to $60 million a sales decline of 10%. A big reason the falloff was a drop in pricing in 1984 caused by the marketplace av ability of big new sources of natu gas, a major ingredient in plastics p duction.

Of the five major items on its pl tics menu, Dow itself produces th itself—styrene, ethylene and benz —and goes outside to buy acrylonit and octene.

division (Merrell Dow and other pharmaceuticals) had a 7% increase in sales, to $758 million, and household products (including Texize and Dow Chemical lines) jumped 88% to $593 million because of Texize's inclusion in only 1985 totals. Agricultural chemicals sales in 1985 were up 5%, to $678 million. Here, too, Dow manufactures much of the basic ingredient line needed for these products but does get from outside suppliers such materials as sugar, alcohol, quinine and organophosphate derivatives.

Dow's acquisitions in 1985 were topped by Texize, the Morton Thiokol division purchase for about $300 million in cash and stock. While doubling the size of Dow's consumer business, the Texize addition led to formation of the company's newest unit, Dow Consumer Products. Dow's pharmaceutical properties shifted to Merrell Dow headquarters in Cincinnati.

Included in Dow Consumer Products are the food care products division in Indianapolis—with the Saran Wrap and Handi-Wrap plastic films and Ziploc plastic bags—and the cleaning products division, based at Texize's Greenville, S.C., headquarters. Also a unit of Dow Consumer Products at Indianapolis is the new ventures division, assigned to develop new business areas other than cleaning and food care.

The company created its healthcare products subsidiary, Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, when it bought Richardson Merrell in 1981 and merged it with the existing Dow pharmaceutical business. Important products from this division are the new nonsedating antihistamine, Terfenadine (sold as Seldane in the U.S.), the world's largest selling branded antihistamine, Nicorette smoking-cessation gum and the new Citracel.

In another move related to healthcare products, Dow in 1985 purchased 20% of the stock of Funai Pharmaceuticals, Osaka, Japan, giving it a marketing foothold in the world's second largest pharmaceutical market.

Dow Chemical also purchased the worldwide polymer business for $232 million from Upjohn Co. Before the acquisition, Dow had two-thirds of the formula to make urethanes, high-quality spongy foam plastics used in furniture padding, insulation and automobile interiors. Upjohn had the other third. A smaller but promising addition to Dow Chemical in 1985 was its acquiring of FilmTec Corp., Minneapolis, for $75 million. FilmTec makes membrane separation devices for purifying liquids, useful in treating brackish water.

Dow Chemical's big escalation in advertising spending is because of the addition of nearly $25 million for Texize brands and increased spending for Merrell Dow, for the plastic wraps and bags, Dow Cleaners and the $6.2 million multimedia, corporate-identity campaign bearing the theme: "Dow lets you do great things."

In measured media spending monitored by Leading National Advertisers, outlays for agricultural products increased 92% to $871,000, primarily for Lorsban insecticides and herbicides, N-Serve soil conditioner and the general Dow agri-chemical line. Agricom-monitored spending, which covers only agricultural-oriented advertising, dropped by 18%, to $1.8 million.

Total ad support for Dow household brands was $33.5 million in 1985 and for Texize, $24.5 million. Support for the Merrell Dow pharmaceutical line in 1985 increased fivefold, to nearly $7 million. Cepacol mouthwash spending in 1985 quadrupled to $1.34 million.

Dow bullish from within

Dow Chemical, despite its worldwide sales (50% of the total) that match its global vision, has grown from the inside out since it set up shop 89 years ago at the brine pits near Midland, Mich. Officers of Dow have been with the company an average of more than 34 years, investing a large portion of their assets in the company's common stock. All Dow senior execs have been selected from within.

Cepacol lozenges expanded by nearly seven times to $706,400. Ziploc bags had 31% more backing, rising to $17.9 million. Saran Wrap's 1985 spending rose 19%, to $2.3 million, but Handi-Wrap plastic wrap spending fell 31%, to $3.7 million.

Dow's use of media in 1985 varied by brands and product type. The greatly expanded Cepacol promotion was almost entirely on spot tv; the agri-chemicals were on outdoor boards. For Dow brands, network tv spending was 67% of the total—$22.5 million—while Texize network tv spending was 85% of its total, or $20.8 million. Dow brand spot tv spending was 16% of its total, or $5.35 million; Texize was 9%, or $2.3 million.

For the company as a whole, the big dollar volume increases came in spot tv, up 272%, to $10.7 million; in network tv, up 144%, to $48.6 million, and magazine spending, up 78% to $10.7 million.

During 1985, Dow entered a joint venture in the biological sciences with a Korean company, but bowed out of a joint venture with Martin-Marietta Corp., Bethesda, Md., to market oil additives, fire-control materials and other products.

The company has been involved in litigation, including the Agent Orange class-action suit; suits alleging that Bendectin antinauseant causes birth defects, and allegations that DBCP, a pesticide ingredient, causes a variety of ailments. No judgments have been brought against Dow in these cases.

Du Pont, seeking to outgrow its traditional definition as a chemical company, capitalized on its strengths in chemical sciences and engineering to generate new business in 1985. At the same time, it took measures to improve productivity, while withdrawing from some of its marginal energy-related businesses.

With 1985 sales and earnings declining, Du Pont increased measured advertising only 5.8%—the major beneficiary being magazine advertising, which increased 17% to $32.1 million.

In 1985, only one of Du Pont's eight operating segments—Petroleum Refining, Marketing and Transportation—had increases in both sales and after-tax operating income. Sales rose 3% to $9.5 billion, and after-tax operating income hit $262 million, up from $78 million in 1984. The only other division showing growth in operating income was Biomedical Products, up 1.5% to $69 million. Petroleum Exploration showed the biggest sales decline, down 12.3% to $3.4 billion. Its after-tax operating income fared even worse, down 18.4% to $310 million.

In reaching out for new opportunities, Du Pont entered into a second joint venture with N.V. Philips of the Netherlands to merge optical disc operations to compete in the worldwide audio disc, video and data storage markets. Du Pont reports a sales objective of $1 billion by the early 1990s in these markets.

Du Pont also purchased a substantial minority position in Heamonetics, a leading supplier of automatic blood processing machines and consumables, and in July, 1986, reached an agreement to purchase for $425 million the American Critical Care unit of Baxter Travenol Laboratories, a manufacturer and distributor of critical care and cardiovascular drugs for use in hospital emergency and surgery departments. Du Pont, as a result of the purchase, enters the top 15 pharmaceutical companies selling to hospitals in the U.S.

Du Pont established a Corporate Automotive Development Center near Detroit to allow it to work more closely with its Motor City customers on evolving technology. In addition, the company used radio and tv time to tout the merits of its thermoplastic auto-body parts over traditional steel parts. Du Pont executives expect the automotive plastics industry to grow to $10 billion in sales by the end of the century.

In the current year, Du Pont has acquired Shell Oil Co.'s U.S. agricultural chemical business, which should bring sales of Du Pont's crop protection line to an estimated $700 million.

Du Pont's fibers once again accounted for the largest part of its $56.1 million in 1985 ad spending as measured by Leading National Advertisers. Spending on Antron carpet fibers declined by 62.3% to $1.2 million, while Antron fibers for wearing apparel drew $5.9 million, up 16.8%.

Spending on Du Pont apparel fibers increased 68.9% to $3.4 million. These fibers are used in clothing, bathing suits and pantyhose bearing names like Albert Nipon, Jantzen, Ocean Pacific and No Nonsense. Spending on Du Pont Dacron declined by 39% to about $2 million, all in magazines and newspaper supplements. Lycra fibers had $3.2 million in measured advertising, off 6.9%, while nylon fibers advertising increased by 60% to $3.7 million.

Of the $6.9 million of measured spending promoting products made with Silverstone coatings—down 20.5% from 1984 levels—$4.5 million was spent on network tv, and spending on Teflon coatings remained relatively stable at $4.6 million, off only 0.8% from 1984. Advertising also declined for Zepel stain repellent by 42% to $685,300.

Du Pont continued its strong corporate advertising effort, with $8.2 million divided among magazines, tv, cable and outdoor. This total represents a 10.9% decline from 1984 levels. Some of Du Pont's $247,900 measured advertising on cable was devoted to its partial underwriting of coverage of the House of Representatives on C-SPAN (Cable Satellite Public Affairs Network).

Du Pont also negotiated an agreement with Seagram Co. Ltd. this March to limit Seagram ownership of Du Pont to 25% to the end of the century, and allowing Seagram to hold a quartet of the seats on the board of directors. Seagram became a part owner of Du Pont when it sought to buy Conoco Inc. in 1981. Du Pont was the eventual winner, but Seagram's $3 billion stake in Conoco became 22.5% ownership of Du Pont when converted.

The troubles at Eastern Air Lines will not vanish overnight when it is acquired in the last quarter of 1986 for $600 million by Texas Air Corp. But analysts say if any company is capable of turning Eastern around, it is Houston-based Texas Air.

Eastern reported $106.5 million labeled advertising and promotion expenses in its budget, up 18.2% from 1984. That figure is pared down to $89.7 million, down 14.7% in actual media and advertising and promotion expenditures free of overhead charges against advertising.

The increase was primarily because of additional price-oriented advertising in cutthroat fare wars through the final six months of 1985. Another factor was increased spending from initiation of a Miami-to-London route in July, 1985, which Eastern dropped as a cost-cutting move one year later.

Newspaper spending was Eastern's largest measured expense, accounting for $24.8 million in 1985, up 33%. Eastern also spent a measured $21.6 million on passenger advertising, divided 71% network tv, 20% magazine, 6% out-of-home and 3% other media.

The U.S. Department of Transportation set an Aug. 31 deadline for approval of Texas Air's Feb. 24 bid to acquire Eastern. President Reagan has 60 days to approve or reject the action. However, final approval is expected by early October, according to Joseph Leonard, who was appointed Eastern's president-chief operating officer Sept. 24, 1985.

Texas Air removed a stumbling block to the Eastern takeover in May, 1986, by selling landing slots and gates that would allow New York-based Pan American World Airways to begin providing air shuttle service Oct. 1 between New York-Boston and New York-Washington. New York Air, a unit of Texas Air, and Eastern currently are sole competitors in these markets, but New York Air will phase out operations 18 months after Pan Am starts, a Texas Air spokesman says. Pan Am says it paid $65 million for 46 landing slots in New York and 18 in Washington and for two airport gates in New York and one in Boston.

The U.S. Department of Justice in May dropped antitrust objections to Texas Air's bid for Eastern, clearing the way for final review by the DOT.

The Texas Air acquisition would be good for Eastern, says Candace Browning, airlines analyst with Oppenheimer & Co., New York. Eastern, which would become a wholly owned subsidiary, has had difficulty in recent years gaining long-term reductions in labor costs from its 41,000 employes, 23,000 of whom are unionized. Eastern's labor costs are among the highest in the industry.

Frank Borman, Eastern's former chairman who resigned effective June 30, 1986, to become vice-chairman and a director of Texas Air, has said Eastern's failure to reach a two-tiered wage agreement with its 12,000-member machinists union was the reason Eastern's board accepted Texas Air's acquisition offer. In May, 1986, Eastern sued the machinists union in an effort to reopen contract negotiations. Mr. Borman said Eastern had gained meaningful labor cost reductions in early 1986 with its 4,300-member pilots association and 7,000-member transport workers union.

Eastern also is saddled with a debt of $2.5 billion, mostly the result of an aggressive fleet modernization program in the early 1980s. The debt costs Eastern about $250 million in interest payments each year and has pushed the carrier repeatedly to the brink of default.

"Texas Air has a very strong-willed management. I think they can turn Eastern around. They sure did the job with Continental," Ms. Browning says. If Texas Air has difficulty gaining labor concessions, it can always transfer Eastern's assets to New York Air or Continental, both of which already are low-cost carriers, she says.

But Texas Air will have its work cut out for it, predicts Louis Marckesano, senior vp-transportation analyst at Janney Montgomery Scott, Philadelphia. "There will be an internal battle with [Texas Air chairman Frank] Lorenzo flexing his muscles in one direction and the machinists union flexing theirs in the other," he says. "For a while there will be a lot of posturing."

Labor concessions would help Eastern's bottom line. The carrier reported a $154.7 million net loss for the first six months of 1986, compared with net income of $49.8 million for the same period in 1985. Revenues slipped to $2.25 billion for the period in 1986 from $2.5 billion in 1985.

In June, Eastern disclosed to the Securities & Exchange Commission that it expects a loss in 1986 of about $57.6 million on revenues of about $4.88

Pursuing Excellence.

Special effort, extra service, nothing less than excellence. At the Times Publishing Company, we insist on dedication that guarantees the needs of readers and advertisers will be met. And while there's much left to be done, we've made some impressive strides:

- In 1984, the St. Petersburg Times was cited as one of America's top ten newspapers by Time magazine and was judged to have the world's best color reproduction by Kodak. Members of our staff have garnered three Pulitzer Prizes: one for public service and two for investigative reporting.
- Winner of more than 600 state, regional and national awards, the Evening Independent is proud of circulation gains that reflect how their new look and personal approach to news has captivated readers who enjoy an afternoon paper.
- Award-winning business publication Florida Trend, and newly successful Georgia Trend will welcome yet another magazine this fall. Arizona Trend will begin publication in Septmeber, 1986.
- Modern Graphic Arts produced more than 190 million pieces of quality printing and opened new offices in Atlanta and Charlotte.
- We publish the weekly report of Congressional Quarterly in Washington D.C.—a report that remains the nation's foremost journal on Congress and Political action.

Most importantly, we're proud of all that these awards, our newspapers and our affiliates represent. Creativity. Professionalism. Excellence. Not just occasionally, but consistently.

Our goal is excellence and service for our readers and advertisers. Every award is another challenge to make Florida's best even better.

billion, which indicates it will have an overall profit for the remainder of the year.

Eastern also is cutting back on service and redeploying its resources to improve profitability, says Richard Blake, vp-marketing, planning and research. In addition to dropping Miami-London service, Eastern is eliminating 12 of 53 daily flights at its Charlotte, N.C., hub, beginning Oct. 1, and plans to sell some aircraft freed by the cuts. The airline also boosted nonstop service between New York and Greenville and Charleston, S.C., and Savannah and Atlanta, Ga.

Mr. Blake says, in some cases, the moves are continuations of marketing programs begun in recent years, such as Eastern's ambitious expansion of its Kansas City, Mo., hub. Since startup of hub operations in December, 1983, Kansas City has grown to be the third largest in the airline's system, generating important east-west traffic, which balances the carrier's traditional north-south route system, he says.

In 1985, Eastern increased to 53 the number of daily flights to Kansas City, adding service to Chicago and Tulsa, Okla. In November, 1985, Air Midwest began feeding into Eastern's Kansas City route system, adding three Midwest cities with the projected addition of 18 cities in 1986. Eastern also established feeder relationships with BarHarbor and Precision Airlines in the northeast U.S., feeding New York and Boston airports. Eastern Express service was introduced in San Juan, P.R., interconnecting islands from Eastern's Caribbean hub.

Eastern lured vacation travelers in the winter of 1985 with five all-inclusive packages to Florida and 17 packages to Caribbean destinations. Included in the airline's packages were airfare, hotel, rental cars and other features.

Mr. Blake also points to Eastern's successful Moonlight Special flights, a nighttime freight-hauling service that also offers low-cost passenger fares at almost 100% profit. The service, a joint venture with CF Airfreight, a Palo Alto, Cal.-based subsidiary of Consolidated Freightways, was inaugurated April 1, 1985, and expanded to 17 cities by yearend. The service helped Eastern boost cargo revenues in 1985 to $291 million, up 39%.

Eastern also is making a push to sell its System One Direct Access travel agency automation program. SODA was launched in 1981 with three participating airlines.

By 1985, it offered 21 direct access participants, serving nearly 5,000 travel agencies and commercial accounts. SODA is critically important to Eastern. Some 67% of the airline's 1985 business was booked by travel agents, the company reports.

Perhaps the most unhappy consequence of the Eastern acquisition is that the carrier no longer will be an independent force in the industry, says Mr. Marchisano of Janney Montgomery. "I would expect eventually for Eastern to lose its identity."

Eastman Kodak Co. fell prey to judicial rulings, pricing pressures and a strong U.S. dollar among a list of adversities in 1985, and 1986 is not much better.

The company is responding by paring its work force and advertising budget and launching a number of new products, including a 35mm camera that brings Kodak back to that market after a 16-year hiatus.

At least on the financial ledgers, the climate has not changed. Kodak in the first half of 1986 reports earnings of $36.4 million, down from $279.5 million in the year-earlier period, on sales of $5.04 billion, up 10%. The earnings reduction, Kodak says, was because of special charges related to work force reductions, inventory writedowns and writeoffs, and the purchase and redemption of bond issues.

Earnings in 1985 particularly were hurt by a court ruling that barred Kodak from manufacturing and selling instant photographic equipment. The ruling culminated a nine-year patent suit filed against Kodak by Polaroid Corp. Kodak had sold more than 16 million such cameras. Kodak was ordered to pay $494 million in damages.

In February, 1986, Kodak began massive layoffs aimed at reducing its work force by 12,900 by the end of the year. A few days later Kodak dropped McCann-Erickson Worldwide from its agency roster, consolidating the work with J. Walter Thompson USA and Young & Rubicam.

The company also reordered its corporate structure this June with the creation of an office of the chief executive, consisting of Colby H. Chandler, chairman and ceo; Kay R. Whitmore, president and now also executive officer, and J. Phillip Samper, vice-chairman and now executive officer. The three share responsibility for Kodak's five principal business groups and their support units.

Mr. Whitmore will oversee three business groups: Diversified Technologies; Eastman Chemicals Division and Life Sciences Division. Mr. Samper's portfolio includes two business groups: Commercial and Information Systems and Photographic Products, previously the Photographic and Information Management Division.

Kodak, despite adverse economic and marketing conditions, is keeping up a steady march of new products to market. Charles Ryan, vp, fundamental research/consumer durables at Merrill Lynch & Co., counted 50 new products from Kodak in the past year, adding that Kodak can reverse Japanese gains in film and electronics as the dollar weakens against the yen. "Currency is most important since it opens the door for competition in cameras," he says. Kodak recorded 36% of its sales outside the U.S. in 1985.

The bulk of Kodak's sales for the year—$8.5 billion, up 2% for the year—came from the Photographic and Information Management Division. Only weeks after being knocked out of the instant camera market, Kodak introduced the VR-35 line of 35mm cameras. The company planned to sell a million of them in the first year. Chinon Industries of Japan manufacturers the units.

Advertising, begun during the Academy Awards program, bearing an "Aim and shoot it" jingle, was directed at a younger audience than the traditional Kodak target. The line consists of five cameras, with the top one, the Medalist, sold only in camera stores. Others are the K10, K12, K40 and K60 models.

The division also rolled out three new films, the VR-G 100, VR-G 200 and VR-G 400. They were shipped this April. Advertising via JWT touted sharper, brighter, "heavily saturated" color.

The VR-G offerings should stimulate ad support for film in 1986. Measured spending on film in 1985 dropped to $27.1 million from $31.7 million, although spending for film processing rose from only $191,000 to $7.1 million, according to Leading National Advertisers, which reports seven media figures. Kodak holds about 80% of the U.S. film market, while Fuji Photo Film USA has a 10% to 12% share, according to Eugene Glazer, analyst with Dean Witter Reynolds, New York. Agfa-Gevaert, 3M and Konishi Roku are other competitors.

The division also bolstered its disc camera line, which has sold 20 million units, with two new models—the Kodak sele disc, which has a telephoto lens, and the disc 3600, a more economical point-and-shoot model. Telly Savalas pushed the entries in print ads designed by JWT. Ad spending on disc cameras declined from $25 million to $13.9 million. Mr. Ryan of Merrill Lynch says competitive pricing on 35mm cameras erodes the growth of the disc market.

The year marked the first full year of sales of half-inch videotape and 8mm video equipment, the latter being part of the Modular Video System, which includes cameras, 8mm cassette tapes, two 8mm recorders and two tuner/timers. Videocassette tape spending slipped from $7.5 million to $2.9 million.

Known for its small, light format, 8mm is facing stiff competition from JVC Corp.'s vhs format camcorder, which like 8mm weighs in at 2.5 lbs. To 8mm "Kodak will be one of three or four big names," Mr. Ryan predicts.

For commercial and information systems, Kodak introduced its Kodak Ektaprint electronic publishing system (KEEPS) and the Kodak image management system (KIMS) for document storage and distribution. Spending for copiers slipped from $3.4 million to $2.6 million.

In dry-silver technologies, Kodak brought out a new family of disks and disc drives from Verbatim, acquired in May, 1985, for $75 million. First-year ad support for Verbatim flexible discs was $935,000.

This May, Kodak introduced a line of batteries, including the traditional alkaline batteries and a nine-volt lithium cell unit that is said to last twice as long as conventional alkaline ones. Mr. Glazer called this introduction "the major event related to marketing."

Brand recognition from the Kodak logo on the batteries will keep down rollout costs, Mr. Glazer says. He estimates the size of the U.S. battery market at $2.5 billion, led by Ralston Purina's Eveready and Dart & Kraft's Duracell.

Kodak's aim could be for a 15% to 20% market share, he adds. Duracell was backed by $23.8 million in measured spending in 1985, and Eveready (then part of Union Carbide) received $27.6 million, according to LNA measured spending.

Mr. Forte indicated that Kodak would mount a major ad push via JWT for the batteries in the fourth quarter, as well as a Christmas campaign for cameras from J.&B.

Kodak and its android machine

Kodak is banking on its just released Ektaprint 300 duplicator and Ektaprint 235 copier-duplicator to build its share in the high-volume end of the $25 billion copier business. The 235 can make 50 copies of 10 pages, shift margin on three pages, erase holes in the margin, copy on both sides and bind the pages in less than two minutes, without any human supervision —more versatile, but not as fast as Xerox. Price is $75,000.

Ford Motor Co., the No. 2 domestic auto maker behind General Motors Corp., continued to diversify, reaching into the financial services, farm machinery and artificial intelligence markets for acquisitions. It also backed the launch of its Ford Taurus and Mercury Sable with its biggest introductory ad budget.

Ford closed the year with an 18.9% share of the total U.S. car market, down slightly from 19.2% in 1984. That was mainly because of production losses from new product changeovers and increased availability of Japanese products. Ford's 12.1% market share in Europe also was down slightly from 13% in 1984 because of increased competitive pressures.

Ford U.S. car sales were up 4.6% in 1985 to 2.07 million units. Ford's highest level in six years. The company's U.S. truck sales were up 9%, reaching 1.27 million units. That represents the highest sales level in seven years and the second-highest volume year in Ford history. The truck share was 26.8%, down from 28% in 1984 because of the delayed introduction of the Aerostar minivan. Fourth-quarter shares rose to 27.5%, when Aerostar was launched.

The new-for-1986 Ford Taurus and Mercury Sable, introduced Dec. 26, 1985, had unit sales of 4,056 and 2,430, respectively, for the last six days of the year and boomed in early For the fourth consecutive year, was the industry's highest-v small car with sales of 420,6 18.9% from 1984. Network tv rose 16.5% to $191.4 million, although spot tv dropped 6% to $37.1 million, according to Leading National Advertisers. Magazine spending came in at $114.7 million, up 18.1%.

Ford continued the diversification strategy begun in 1984, although it lost to GM a bid for Hughes Aircraft Co., El Segundo, Cal. In August, Ford spent $493 million to acquire First Nationwide Financial Corp., San Francisco, the ninth largest savings & loan association in the U.S. That company, with assets of $10.7 billion, was merged with Ford Credit. In October, Ford acquired Sperry New Holland, the world's largest manufacturer of specialized farm equipment, from Sperry Corp., New York, paying $330 million and assuming $110 million in liabilities. A month later, Ford purchased a 10% interest in both Carnegie Group, Pittsburgh, and Inference Corp., Los Angeles, two specialists in artificial intelligence software.

1985 marked another year of finance incentive wars that led to some of the lowest-ever annual percentage rates in the auto industry. Spurred by a softening economy and increased competition from the imports, Ford started the fray by offering 0.6% financing on full-size pickup trucks. Ford and its competitors have countered and recountered to the point where Ford now is offering 5.5% financing.

Ads for Ford's new-for-1986 Aerostar minivan, targeted at affluent, younger families, broke in September on network tv and radio and in newsweeklies, with print drawing comparisons between Ford and Chrysler products. Ford's strategy also involved direct mail to 600,000 owners of Chrysler minivans. Ford would not disclose total ad spending for the minivan, but said it was the most ever for a truck introduction. LNA showed spending of $20.6 million during 1985 for Aerostar.

Ford spent $3 billion to develop and build Ford Taurus and Mercury Sable, its new front-wheel-drive, intermediate sedans that replaced the rear-drive LTD/Marquis series. In December, Ford broke a yearlong $100 million ad blitz for the two cars, its biggest-ever marketing launch.

The vehicles targeted separate audiences. Ford division aimed at a male middle-market group leaning toward domestic cars. Ford also contributed funds and creative help to its 67 dealer ad groups for the launch and more funds for introductory sales promotion and merchandising.

Mercury targeted "achievers," affluent, trend-conscious, well-educated buyers. With Taurus-Sable, Ford hoped to establish a larger presence in the intermediate car market before Japanese importers began to make the sort of inroads they made in the small-car segment.

In December, Ford began formulating new marketing approaches to ethnic groups and other target groups. L-M hired UniWorld Group, New York, to handle black and Hispanic campaigns previously handled by primary agency Young & Rubicam, Detroit. L-M also is looking at assigning a separate women-oriented agency.

Ford also made a major change overseas, picking Y&R to replace J. Walter Thompson Co. for its $50 million account in Germany where its market share has slipped from more than 15% in the 1970s to 10.7% by the end of 1985.

Soon afterward, Kenneth Whipple was named chairman at Ford of Europe, replacing Robert Lutz, who was appointed exec vp-truck operations. Mr. Lutz resigned that post in June, moving to Chrysler Motors as exec vp overseeing international, truck and component business operations.

Philip Benton Jr. was moved to exec vp of Ford International Automotive Operations, from vp-diversified products. Mr. Benton was succeeded by Edwin Williams, from vp-truck operations. Separately, B.J. Coughlan was named vp-sales for Ford of Europe, from executive director-marketing staff for Ford in the U.S., succeeding Gordon MacKenzie, who retired Aug. 1. Succeeding Mr. Coughlan was James O'Connor, from vp-sales and marketing for Ford of Canada. L-M also named to ad manager, Sheldon Wardwell, formerly district sales manager of L-M's Memphis, Tenn., district, replacing Tom Ryan, who left the company.

In July, 1986, Ford and Kia Motors Corp., one of Korea's three largest auto manufacturers, signed an agreement for Ford to acquire 10% of the company for $30 million. Ford will market a Kia-built minicar in the U.S. next spring, keeping Ford in the "captive import" business like GM and Chrysler. Ford also imports the Merkur XR4Ti.

Ford division in late 1985 started a regional marketing strategy, opening new marketing offices on the Pacific coast, in the Southwest and Northeast to work with dealers in developing special products for their area.

Ford expanded its California marketing program to include five states (California, Oregon, Washington, Arizona and Nevada) and reassigned L-M marketing plans manager Ben Lever III to marketing manager of the Pacific coast branch in San Jose.

The Southwest office in Dallas is headed by Steve Lyons, former truck marketing plans manager for Ford truck division.

Gerry Frick, former assistant district sales manager in Memphis, became Northeast marketing manager in Teterboro, N.J.

Ford division's 1986 media spending is putting more emphasis on magazines, both general circulation and women's books, to reach more women. Aside from Taurus, its creative broke little new ground, continuing old themes.

L-M, Ford's upscale division, split 1986 advertising by brand. While most dealers offer all three—Lincoln, Mercury and imported Merkur—L-M separated them with umbrella campaigns for each brand starting in the fall.

The Merkur XR4Ti model was stressed as sporty to distinguish Merkur as a brand name before L-M brings over the $20,000-to-$25,000 Scorpio from Europe in spring of 1987 as the second Merkur.

L-M is considering a regional launch of Scorpio when it arrives, partly because of adjustments made in XR4Ti merchandising after the car had gone on sale nationally in January, 1985. That model was relaunched in September partly because dealers didn't have enough stock when L-M spent all its ad money early in the year. Also, the initial launch went much slower than anticipated.

L-M continued a thrust begun in 1985 to have a more distinct identity from its sister division. It emphasized more regional efforts, using dealer associations, and stepped up efforts to reach women, blacks and young persons.

Part of the strategy was to use popular recording artists in commercials to push the youthful image. Ford ran into hot water, however, with Bette Midler, whose sound-alike sang her hit tune, "Do You Wanna Dance?" for L-M's Sable.

Ms. Midler filed a $10 million lawsuit against Ford Motor Co. and L-M agency Y&R, contending that the Sable ad violates a California law barring unauthorized use of a celebrity's name, voice, autograph or likeness. The case is pending.

As part of a sweeping approach to reaching women car buyers, L-M made yearlong contractual buys in April, 1986, issues of Ms., Savvy and Working Woman. The division's new plan included increased emphasis on sensitizing dealers to women buyers through training films and seminars at the national dealer show in August; a preapproved credit program via direct mail; a safe-car travel test program for infants, and efforts to provide women and other buyers with more information.

L-M presented this plan to 20 women's magazines in April, 1986, headed by Edsel Ford II, general marketing manager, who caused a stir the previous summer when he said he wasn't sure if he believed women's magazines effectively delivered women's car buyers or not.

The resulting complaints from women's magazines partly accounted for L-M reevaluating magazine buys.

In July, 1986, Ford introduced a souped-up version of its Ranger truck, dubbed the GT, in a limited production run for California. The introductory campaign focused on the small truck's high performance, describing it as "the first sports car that comes with a bed."

The Ranger GT, priced at less than $10,000, is aimed at young people who can't afford the sticker price or hefty insurance premiums associated with high-performance cars. If the vehicle sells well in California, Ford may market it nationally.

Future products in the works include: A Mazda-designed Mexican-built subcompact called Tracer at the rate of 100,000 annually, starting in 1987 and Mazda-designed sporty compact cars at Mazda's Flat Rock, Mich., assembly plant beginning in 1988.

Ford also is considering an inexpensive, two-seat sports car to compete with the Pontiac Fiero in the late 1980s. Also under consideration are a front-wheel-drive small passenger van by 1989 and several four-wheel-drive options for cars and light trucks.

General Mills spent much of 1 digging itself out of a financial b after a dip into the retailing and res rant businesses left it overextended. Early in 1985, it spun off its toy b new and solid chunks of its retail b and sold the unsuccessful restaur properties.

The remaining operations w streamlined, including the restructuring in November of its consumer foods unit to become more strongly focused on major growth businesses and to capitalize on growth opportunities.

Fiscal results have proved responsive: A 7% increase in fiscal 1986 sales and a 59% improvement in net income from continuing operations.

Mark Willes, former exec vp-chief financial officer, was named president, a post that had been vacant for three years since H. Brewster Atwater was named chairman-ceo in 1982.

Mr. Willes' c/o duties were shifted to F. Caleb Blodgett, the company's vice-chairman, who also added the chief administrative officer title after Donald Swanson, also a former vice-chairman, left the company in 1983.

Additionally, General Mills split its consumer foods group, which accounts for 57% of total sales, into two segments: Grocery products and convenience/international foods. The move will bring more personalized attention to General Mills' brands, analysts say.

Arthur Schulze now is president of grocery products, including the Big G cereals, Betty Crocker dessert and baking mixes, Helper dinners and potato mixes, Gold Medal flour and other lines.

Steven Rothschild is now president of convenience and international foods, both considered major growth areas by the company. His unit includes Gorton's seafoods, Yoplait yogurt, snacks and international operations as well as new food segments.

Joe Lee remains president of the restaurant group, and David Waters still oversees specialty retailing.

In addition to those moves, General Mills made Stephen Warhover, vp-general manager of the company's "wholesome snack" business, president of Gorton. General Mills expects to see the Gorton's brand grow by 15% over the next five years.

Mr. Warhover is responsible for General Mills' commanding lead in the $195 million dried-fruit snack category, where its Fruit Corners brand holds a more than 75% share. Its Nature Valley line of granola bars holds a 23% share of the $438 million granola bar segment.

The company added Nature Valley Boppers with a $25 million tv (22-week flight); print and coupon effort in December. The product has a peanut butter center with a chocolate crunchy coating.

Fruit Corners Fruit Wrinkles, a dried fruit product shaped like a coffee bean, rolled onto grocery store shelves this summer in an effort to combat Thomas J. Lipton Inc.'s Fun Fruits dried fruit pellets. Fruit Wrinkles debuted with $24 million in coupons, print, network tv and cable tv support.

One food segment the company has focused on is the $4.7 billion ready-to-eat cereal market. General Mills, with a 24% market share, holds the No. 2 position behind Kellogg Co.'s 43% share. Big G threw more than $70 million into advertising and promotion for three new cereal products during the first three months of 1986, more new cereal products than it introduced in all of 1985.

In January, Big G launched Raisin Nut Bran, followed by Rocky Road children's cereal in February and Circus Fun, another presweetened entry, in March.

All three cereals received network tv and couponing, but General Mills tried an unusual approach to selling cereal with Rocky Road. The company bought network radio time on syndicated Top 40-type programs in an attempt to reach teen agers.

Last year, Big G added Pro-Stars cereal in Canada, leading with a $1.5 million campaign featuring Edmonton Oilers' superstar Wayne Gretzky.

Capitalizing on the calcium phenomenon, General Mills added calcium to its Gold Medal flour. Promoting the formula change was limited to the packaging.

Betty Crocker was busy in the kitchen last year, whipping up new cake varieties, box meals and popcorn. Betty also got a "face lift" early this year, her seventh since her debut in 1936. The $1 million effort gave Betty a softer hair style and dressed her in a business suit.

Pop Secret popcorn entered the $400 million popcorn category with a $15 million advertising effort. The move was part of General Mills' plan to establish beachheads in new parts of the grocery store.

Advertising for Betty Crocker's Cake Lovers' Collection features cartoon character Cathy tooting the cakes as "A new obsession." The cakes combine flour mix with dried ingredients in a resort pouch for a chunkier mix.

Also new last year was Twice Baked Potatoes, a box mix that received print and coupons from agency Campbell-Mithun, Minneapolis.

This fall, General Mills will spend $23 million on the national introduction of Betty Crocker Oriental Classics, a line of oriental boxed dinner mixes similar to its Hamburger, Chicken and Tuna Helper products. Network tv, coupons and magazines will support.

The company has aggressive expansion plans for its restaurant chains, Red Lobster, LeeAnn Chin and Olive Garden. GM added 20 Red Lobster units this year, and plans another 25 per year until 1990, when it's projected there will be 500 Red Lobster seafood units around the world.

Olive Garden, the company's Italian restaurant concept, is to grow from 14 to 115 units by 1989, General Mills says. LeeAnn Chin's, a full-service, takeout, deli, Chinese food concept, is to expand into a second major market beyond its Minneapolis/St. Paul base this fiscal year. There are three full-service units and five deli-takeouts, all in Minneapolis/St. Paul.

General Mills' divestiture plan left it with only one specialty retailing unit, Talbots, which sells high-quality, classic women's apparel. The company added petite sizes last year, helping boost sales by 44%. Talbots had 59 stores operating at yearend.

General Mills' restaurant unit shifted the $35 million Red Lobster Inns of America account to Grey Advertising, New York, from Backer & Spielvogel, New York, in November, 1985. In April, the company also gave Grey the York's Choice account, formerly with Meldrum & Fewsmith, Cleveland.

GM's U.S. Food division in July shifted the $15 million Yoplait yogurt account to Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, from DFS/Dorland, New York. The shift included Yoplait's new soft frozen yogurt, vetting in selected markets.

General Motors Corp. entered a disgrace phase in 1987 after a spate of multi-billion-dollar acquisitions ending with the purchase of satellite and aerospace specialist Hughes Aircraft Co. on Dec. 31, 1985.

The harvest of El Segs' six Cal-Electro Hughes capped this multi-billion-dollar buying spree, in which GM also picks up Electronic Data Systems, Dallas, and several small machine-vision and emerging-technology companies, which will give it access to technology that might be adopted into vehicle production as well as some revenue not dependent on the cyclical auto industry.

The cyclical and competitive nature of the industry left the auto marketer with a 14.9% growth in sales but a decline of 11.5% in earnings in 1985, the latter affected by cut-rate financing incentives that sliced margins, and cost of installing new technology to enhance competitiveness.

Those factors continued to hold down financial results into the first half of 1986. Earnings for the six-month period dipped 8.3% to $2.04 billion, on revenues of $54.45 billion, up 11%.

Slimming down, restructuring and integrating acquisitions continue to be major concerns of management. One year as Chairman Roger Smith's meticulous efforts to mould the company into his vision of a "21st century corporation" filters down to middle-management level, the toughest act, and as GM at times seems to be struggling to implement an sweeping reorganization begun in early 1984.

Led by Wall Street stock analysts who once assailed GM execs for being too shortsighted, critics by the spring of 1986 began to lambast GM top brass as too preoccupied with restructuring to protect the auto maker's slipping market share.

They also were concerned that high capital spending was cutting into profitability.

General Motor's share of the car market fell to 42.19% in 1985 from 44.64% in 1984. GM's sales gained $1.193 to 4,582,507 in 1985, but failed to keep pace with a 760,000-unit rise in the total car market to 11.89 million. Pontiac was the only division to post a share gain in 1985, from 6.8% to 7.2%. Oldsmobile and Chevrolet improved unit sales slightly but lost share in the strong market, down 0.5 points to 9.8% for Oldsmobile and off 0.8% to 14.5% for Chevy.

Buick and Cadillac suffered unit sales declines, with their share dropping 0.3 points to 2.8% for Cadillac and 1.3% to 7.3% for Buick as its sales plummeted from 919,904 in 1984 to 851,231 in 1985.

GM brass countered by saying the internal makeover and heavy investment in technology and modernization is necessary if GM is to keep its No. 1 position into the next century.

But GM made several cost-cutting moves that analysts called concessions to market pressure. GM cut back capital spending, it centered on delayed some advanced product programs, such as the plastic-bodied Saturn-Fiero-Firebird replacement, nine-car A-body and mixed engine developments.

GM dropped some plans temporarily because of reduced sales volume projections on some programs, like CK900, the code name for the late-'90s midsized series to replace conventional specialty models.

Even Saturn Corp., GM's new subsidiary designed to develop new methods of designing, manufacturing and marketing a small U.S.-built car by 1990, was not immune from the belt-tightening.

Saturn planned investment was reduced, "although not enough to significantly harm the project," a spokesman says.

And president F. James McDonald said in August, 1986, that Saturn's much-ballyhooed Spring Hill, Tenn., complex of up to six separate assembly, engine and components plants would be phased in rather than to explode by the start of production in 1990.

Emerging trends in GM marketing included continuing efforts to squeeze additional efficiency and effectiveness out of GM ad-dollars, a buildup in GM's internal marketing capabilities and a swing to regional marketing. The squeeze came to GM mainstay ad agencies when the company reduced commissions paid to about 13%.

Robert T. O'Connell, vp-marketing and product planning staffs, boosted GM's internal media and research capabilities by hiring Philip Guarascio and Vincent Barabba. Mr. Guarascio, who ran the media department at Benton & Bowles, New York, was hired Oct. 1, 1985, as exec director of ad planning services. Mr. Barabba, a two-time head of the U.S. Census and Eastman Kodak's director of marketing intelligence, came aboard simultaneously as executive director of research services.

Together, they were charged with developing "GM's vision of the future" in marketing. Mr. Guarascio's office took over coordinating GM divisional advertising and media negotiations, although each division's agencies continued to make the actual media purchases, a tactic aimed at improving GM's bargaining clout without damaging its agencies. Mr. Guarascio denied considerable speculation that GM would eventually take media buying in-house.

GM intensified pressure on all media for lower rates and other concessions, including a concerted push on magazines starting in the fall of 1985.

Results were mixed. GM often won its multiyear, rate-guarantee contracts but less frequently on rates based on model years than calendar years and other demands.

General Motors' "factory" contributions to dealer ad associations (groups of same-brand dealers in individual markets) rose slightly to an estimated $307 million in 1985. The total, significantly smaller than the dealer's individual kick-ins to the association funds, is included in the charts as measured media spending.

The brightest spot among GM's car divisions in 1985 and early 1986 was Pontiac, with a host of better things to come for Chevrolet, the other small-car specialist in GM's brand family.

Chevrolet, with a goal of regaining a 20% share of the U.S. passenger car market, entered the 1986 model year with a big-car, small-car strategy. Robert Burger, vp-general manager, told Chevy needed to sell 1 million larger cars led by "new" versions Celebrity and Cavalier and another million units of small cars. Chevrolet's 1986 small car stable encompassed the U.S.-built Cavalier and the aging Chevette and Opel Japanese vehicles: tiny Sprint imported from Suzuki Motor Co., Spectrum from Isuzu Ltd. and Nova, a rebadged Toyota Corolla assembled in California from New United Motors Manufacturing, the GM-Toyota joint venture.

The latter three, previously sold only regionally because of import quota or supply restrictions, were debuted in October, 1985, with an "international auto show" ad campaign, continued in the import-dominated West and expanded from the division's "Today's Chevrolet" theme. The campaign was designed to inform youthful prospects that Chevy had imports and to shed a large-car image among the young.

Sales, especially of Nova, lagged and the campaign was dropped in early 1986.

Two other major marketing programs unveiled for Chevy in the 1986 model-year. One was a huge effort to target women buyers, with Chevy becoming a leader in this emerging national trend among auto marketers. Chevy agency Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., aimed few commercials only at women in terms of creative content. A 1984 Chevy "point track" magazine ad and research showed women married being screened from the mainstream that way.

But Chevy restructured its media buying for 1986, deemphasizing to sports in favor of more prime-time and news daytime and buying more "active women's" magazine space. Chevy beat Ford Motor Co., Chrysler Corp. and other GM divisions to the punch by being the first to offer preapproved credit through GM's financing arm via a mail-in coupon that was part of a campaign in Cosmopolitan.

Another major effort was into regionalized advertising, which Chevrolet has been experimenting with since 1984 when it assigned part of its national budget to Ally-Gleason & Putnam, Los Angeles, for a California effort.

By the spring of 1986, Chevrolet and Campbell-Ewald had reorganized their regional offices and had regional campaigns in place for Texas and the Northwest. Chevy's regional efforts were budgeted to receive up to $250 million in calendar 1986, not including the normal factory contributions to dealer ad associations.

Pontiac, with 27-story Missouri Benton & Bowles' "We build excitement" theme well established and more product to match the youthful, sporty imagery, has gone from corporate goat in 1982 to corporate hero. Pontiac has GM's youngest and best-educated median buyer and is challenging Buick for third place in unit sales within GM.

For the second season, Pontiac concentrated nearly all its advertising on the division's image cars. They were broadened beyond Fiero, Sunbird, Firebird and 6000 by the arrival of midsized specialty Grand Am, which quickly exceeded sales expectations at Pontiac.

While sister cars Oldsmobile Calais and Buick Somerset lagged, Grand Am has gone from an initial 20% of the N-car production to half.

Pontiac marketing efforts reflect its image. In January, 1986, the division launched a $4.5 million California regional campaign, its third annual and largest yet. It was coordinated by D'ARCY-MASIUS with dealer group agencies Sawdon & Bess, Los Angeles, for Southern California and Craig & Hasbrouck, Sacramento, for the north. The campaign was heavy on outdoor boards done in hot pastels, spot tv, radio and 130,000 California direct mailings.

A separate $4 million spring campaign aimed at 18 to 24-year-olds broke in March, 1986. The campaign was concentrated on 300 college campuses. Tv, radio and print were bolstered by concert tie-ins and a tie-in with a General Motors Acceptance Corp. mailing to 800,000 graduating college seniors.

Advertising gains in the '80s Buick division faltered in 1985. Executives placed some blame on lack of product because of slow startups on all-new versions of the LeSabre and Riviera, but by the summer of 1986 were enthusiastic the emphasis put on youthful, sporty cars like the performance T-type versions of more models that seemed to be confusing traditional luxury-minded buyers.

Buick continued experimenting with a variety of unconventional marketing tools, usually coordinated through its Marketing Through Technology de-[illegible] Telemarketing, product information computer displays in airports and shopping malls, and electronic lookups between headquarters and dealers are already in place. Meanwhile, Buick explores ways to influence consumers at the stage when a new car is being weighed against vacations, appliances and electronic entertainment devices.

Oldsmobile division widened the gap between its sales and Buicks with another million-unit year in 1985, good enough for third among all brands in the U.S. behind Chevrolet and Ford division.

Oldsmobile continued its consistent mainstream advertising that has created one of the strongest marketing images in GM's stable. Under the 1986 reorganization concept, Oldsmobile's assigned place is guarding the upscale, conservative sector. Even with orders for all divisions to seek more distinct marketing images, Olds has been able to do so by not moving with the market as it swings to more expressive, sportier styling.

Cadillac division, which like Buick has had to move its image further, enjoyed a successful 1985 model year but was down in the '86 model year despite continued improvement in the luxury segment. Cadillac still dominates the 1.1 million unit top of the market with a nearly one-third share.

But European and for the first time Japanese imports continue to target luxury and near-luxury buyers in the U.S. New additions like the Acura Legend hunting, due in early 1987, keep coming. And Ford's Lincoln gained strength, in part because of more distinctive styling.

A September, 1985, commercial from Lincoln-Mercury agency Young & Rubicam was effective in playing on Cadillac's perceived styling sameness. It portrayed country club patrons and parking valets being unable to tell the difference between black Cadillacs, Buicks and Oldsmobiles. Cadillac fought back on two fronts, while mentally, Cadillac designers reworked future products to provide more distinctiveness.

Seeing traditional buyer portions of the population start to turn to imports for a taste of the exotic, Cadillac planners sought a new class of hunting traditionalists. Hispanics are a rapidly growing group with increasing wealth and a pro-family orientation that shows preference toward larger cars. Cadillac is trying to tap that market, especially with Spanish-speaking immigrants who might choose a Cadillac as a symbol of American success.

Cadillac launched a special effort in Florida in November, 1985, with its all-new Eldorado and Seville models, aimed at Hispanics. A separate, but related campaign tied pitch, an upscale sports targeted by the division since 1985, as the U.S. was paid by Britain's polo-playing Prince Charles.

Cadillac's other major effort is paving the way for the late 1986 arrival of the Allante, its first "import," first two-seater, first sports car and, at an expected $50,000, most expensive model ever. The Allante was designed by Italian coach maker Industrie Pininfarina, based on a U.S. chassis and power train. The bodies will be built in Italy and airfreighted to Detroit for final assembly.

While the Allante's projected volume is only about 4,000 a year, Cadillac is counting on Allante to cement the divisional marketing image more firmly upscale and position Cadillac as a more serious competitor against Mercedes-Benz, BMW and Jaguar in the super-luxury end of the market.

GE/RCA reunite

RCA Corp.'s link to GE runs back to 1919, when RCA was formed at the urging of the U.S. Navy, which wanted independence in U.S. communications. GE, which held patents to long-distance transmission equipment, was RCA's first major shareholder, partlaying that into an ownership position. The RCA Radiotron II crystal set introduced in 1922 was manufactured by GE. In 1932, RCA became independent when the government forced the separation of RCA and GE. The GE memory lingered on, however, in the NBC chimes—G.E.C.

General Electric Co., concentrating its efforts on major services and technology business lines, enhanced that corporate strategy in June, 1986, with the $6.28 billion buyout of RCA Corp., owner of NBC Television Network.

Under the merged company, NBC becomes a separate GE subsidiary, as does RCA. John F. Welch Jr., chairman-ceo of GE, will be chairman-ceo of the combined company, which will have its headquarters in Fairfield, Conn. Robert R. Frederick will remain president-ceo of RCA. Richard W. Miller, formerly an RCA exec vp, was named senior vp-consumer electronics, reporting to Mr. Welch. He was regarded by many as the successor to Mr. Frederick prior to the merger.

GE was expected to announce in late August that Thomas Tisch, chairman-ceo of NBC, would be replaced by Robert C. Wright, 42, previously president-ceo of GE Financial Services Inc., and GE Credit Corp. Mr. Tisch has led NBC the past five years in its surge past CBS and ABC in the prime-time ratings charts, and has been planning to leave at the conclusion in July of his five-year contract.

As a result of the Justice Department's review of the proposed acquisition, GE will sell, by Nov. 30, 1986, its videocassette business. FCC crossownership rules against multiple ownership in the same market also requires GE to sell five NBC radio stations in New York City, Chicago and Washington D.C. where NBC has tv stations.

A grandfather clause had permitted RCA and other media companies with multiple ownership in the same market to retain their properties when regulations were passed against crossownership. The sale of such a "grandfathered" media company voids that clause for the new owner.

GE had 1985 earnings of $2.34 billion, up 2% from 1984, on sales of $28.28 billion, up 1%. RCA had 1985 earnings of $369.1 million, up 4.2% on sales of $8.97 billion, up 3.5%. Earnings for NBC Tv Network rose 54% in 1985 on a 12% gain in sales.

Advertising for the two companies in 1985 was a composite $378.3 million, down 16.4% from a composite 1984, according to the 11 measured media monitored for this issue. According to the seven media indices of Leading National Advertisers, RCA spent $63.9 million in 1985, and GE spent $63 million in measured media.

However, the RCA expenditure was a drop of 27.9% largely because of its sale in 1985 of Hertz to UAL. Hertz in 1984 was supported with $42.9 million, which has grown to $43 million under UAL. RCA products moving at support in 1985 included RCA color tv sets, down 16% to $5.8 million, RCA convertible videocassette recorders down 21.3% to $8.7 million. The company virtually stopped spending on its video camera & vcr, its Selectavision videomonitor, the video remote control and video sound camera. NBC Tv Network ad support grew 12.3% to $225.8 million, and continued to be the big ad line item at RCA.

Among the media mix, network tv dropped the most—from $76.2 million in 1984 to $8 million, a good portion of that credited to the exiting of Hertz from the RCA media charts.

GE's total L.P.A. expenditure grew 4.2%, mostly in magazine support which was up 55.3% to $43.2 million. The big jump in ad expenditures was credited to home light bulbs, backed with $43.1 million, up 772.3%. Support for microwave ovens jumped 156% to $4.1 million. GE general promotion (not product-specific) grew 52% to $9.9 million in 1985.

The biggest drop in ad spending for a major product was for home telephones, which received $1.2 million, down from $23.8 million in 1984.

Mr. Welch says the "merger further accelerates a process that has seen GE grow into a major services and technology business. In the last five years services and technology businesses moved from about 31% to about 71% of the company's earnings." GE has been selling off units that don't fit its strategy. Such transactions generated approximately $700 million in 1985, bringing the company's five-year total divestiture count to $5.6 billion. It has been buying units that fit, too. GE is paying an estimated $680 million to purchase 80% of Kidder Peabody & Co., a Wall Street securities firm whose capital-raising acumen could help build GE Financial Services into one of the leading players in the investment banking business. Kidder's capital in April, 1986, when the agreement was struck was $464 million, about a fifth of that of market leader Merrill Lynch & Co.

GE's central long-term strategy is intended to make the company either number one or two in market share in 15 businesses, which it has grouped into three segments. Core manufacturing, technology and services.

In core manufacturing, GE has six large businesses—lighting, major appliance, motor, turbine, transportation, construction equipment—that have a commanding or leading market position. In the past five years, GE has invested more than $2 billion in these businesses. Despite heavy investment costs and unfavorable economic conditions, the earnings of these businesses as a group have increased at an average annual clip of 7%.

GE's large technology businesses—medical systems, aircraft engines, aerospace, materials, factory automation—are positioned to improve their competitiveness through acquisition and r&d investment. R&D expenses in these businesses was $7.8 billion over the past five years, with $3.6 billion also spent on plant and equipment. During the 1981-85 period, earnings in these technology businesses as a group grew at an average annual rate of 19%.

In GE's services businesses—construction and engineering, and financial, nuclear and information services—its strategy is to grow by adding entrepreneurs and by making related acquisitions. The five-year average annual earnings growth for the group, led by financial services, is 16%.

GE expects to generate 40% of its post-merger earnings from technology and services, while it continues to maximize the competitive strength of its growing manufacturing segment. GE reports that "RCA's services and technology businesses—the NBC network, broadcast stations, aerospace and defense businesses, communications and RCA Service Co.—will complement its businesses and help improve global competitiveness."

General Electric's economic outlook for 1986 is mixed. Although a few positives have emerged, the company is concerned about inflation-adjusted "real" interest rates, lower wage costs created for Japanese and Korean competitors with currently favorable foreign rates, and U.S. tax reform. Against this backdrop, GE's projections forecast a relatively low-growth scenario with modest earnings growth. Should the economy be more in line with the consensus forecast of close to 4% real GNP growth, it is well-positioned for good earnings growth.

Gillette Co., which sought growth in 1983 through its existing business segments and product extensions, got slight gains in its main product lines and modest over-all sales and earnings growth.

Brian McFarland, vp-advertising services, calls Gillette a mature company that continued to give brands their traditional levels of supports, with normal cyclical ups and downs.

Measured media advertising continued to slip, to $86.2 million in 1983 from $88.7 million in 1982 and $93.1 million in 1981.

Magazine spending increased 12%, to $12.1 million, and sweet-all or spending declined as network dipped 11.8% to $55.6 million, and spot tv rose 36.4% to $16.1 million.

Gillette posted operating profit of $380 million, up 8% from 1982. There were slight gains in operating profit in blades and razors, up 2% to $266 million on a sales increase of 4%, and toiletries and cosmetics, up 5% to $59 million on a 3% growth in sales. Writing instruments and office products declined 12% in operating profit to $10 million on sales that dropped 2%.

The financial plus at Gillette was in its Braun products segment, in which operating profit grew 12% to $30 million, on a 2% increase in sales.

Most of the year-to-year improvement came from international sales, as Gillette reported virtually unchanged domestic sales figures. Gillette reported a gain of $68 million in foreign currency translation in 1983, compared with a loss of $89 million in 1982. Foreign activities the past two years have represented 57% of total sales and operating profits.

The year marked the formation of Braun Inc. to market the products in the U.S. In March, Lowe Marschalk got the nod as Braun's first domestic agency with a $10 million to $15 million budget.

Blades and razors continues to be Gillette's most important operation. Gillette introduced the Atra Plus twin blade shaving system with a lubricated strip for shaving sensitive skin on a $16 million campaign.

Micro Trac, a twin-blade disposable, was introduced in January with "the essence of shaving" theme. Mr. McFarland says Gillette made "significant marketing progress under the 'essence of shaving' campaign, now in its second year, having begun with the original Atra."

Gillette continues to have more than 50% of the market in unit and dollar sales in the shaving area, with Schick second in dollar sales and Bic second in unit sales.

Over-all, Atra advertising rose slightly, according to LNA, from $9.7 million in 1982 to $9.76 million in 1983. Spending for Good News! disposable razors was $5.82 million, up slightly from $5.72 million.

In toiletries and cosmetics, Gillette introduced solid and aerosol versions of its Dry Idea roll-on antiperspirant, along with higher sales of Soft & Dri products, this offset lower sales of other deodorants and antiperspirants. Lynn Elyman, analyst with Smith Barney, Harris Upham & Co., says the Dry Idea extensions added incrementally to sales and kept the whole deodorant segment up. Domestic shampoo sales rose sharply based on consumer response to the new White Rain shampoo.

Discounted by LNA in 1982, White Rain shampoo spending was $1.13 million in 1983. Gillette extended the line this April with White Rain hair-styling mousse, supported by a $2.2 million campaign from BBDO featuring singer Louise Mandrell as spokeswoman. Mr. McFarland says White Rain has expanded from distribution in the South to a national brand. Diana Temple, vp with Salmon Brothers, New York, says the introductions "allowed Gillette to hold share in that market."

Mr. Elyman calls the White Rain moves very successful at staking out a position in "the value end of the haircare market." She says Gillette also bolstered its presence at the premium end of the haircare market with Wind Difference mousse, liquid stylizer and gel shipped in July. Also, Gillette planned to introduce a styling mousse and styling gel aimed at men under the Dry Look name in September, supported by a $5.7 million advertising and promotional campaign from BBDO.

Major spending in the area included Dry Idea roll-on, up to $7.45 million from $6.48 million; Right Guard deodorant products, up sharply from $1.46 million to $7.05 million; Right Guard stick antiperspirant, down $299,000 from $3.58 million; Silkience shampoo, down to $30.5,000 from $2.95 million; Silkience shampoo and conditioner up to $5.1 million from $642,000; Soft & Dri deodorants, up to $4.24 million from $370,000; Brush Plus product up from $3.2 million to $6.3 million, and Soft & Dri spray deodorants, down to $1.5 million from $4.22 million.

In 1981, Gillette made a major creative shift in its Right Guard advertising. Mr. McFarland credits this to "failure from a change in the marketing strategy rather than any dissatisfaction with previous campaigns."

Replacing the "9 to Work Fast" approach is the amusing "Mr. Right" campaign, which first aired on the Super Bowl broadcast in January. It shows "Mr. Wrong" monsters ineffectively tangling out in what seems to be a singles bar. A bit of Right Guard and they become Mr. Rights. Mr. McFarland says, "The time was right to take the brand younger and rebuild the franchise with younger men." Young & Rubicam handles.

In writing instruments, domestic sales of ruling ball pens rose sharply, led by the Atra-Point pen and the early 1983 launch of the Rollerstick pen. Paper White ballpoint pen advertising declined from $4.5 million to $3.67 million. Another introduction was the Paper White Advancer refillable pencil and the Liquid Paper line's Just For Forms correction fluid. Liquid paper spending rose to $3.59 million from $1.35 million, according to LNA.

Mr. Elyman says Paper White's sales rose 2% in the first quarter of 1984, while domestic operating profits rose 13%. She says this resulted from capital investments finally contributing to profit levels."

She also detected "a fair amount of excitement" in the Braun segment getting wider distribution. Initially Braun products were found in specialty stores; now, however, versions of products with fewer "bells and whistles" are available through mass merchandisers like K mart and Sears. This avoids overlap with more upscale retailers.

Gillette continues a heavy involvement in 15-second commercials. The company now produces original 15-second spots besides cutting them from 30-second spots. The new approach reflects the difficulty of making an effective 15 from an old commercial. Mr. McFarland says the 15s support "all mature brands with established positioning," rather than new products. Of 8 to 20 brands being advertising at any one time, 14 to 15 typically are mature.

GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER CO.
Stockholder Mktgs. Coll.

Ronald E. Clark, president

Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., which had tire sales in 1983 retained its place as the world's largest producer of tires and rubber products. It is also known for its blimps, which were prominent in London and Philadelphia for the Live Aid anti-famine concerts. Goodyear says the cameras gave it the "widest exposure in blimp history."

What is less known about the company is the venture into aerospace, a field which brought Goodyear a 12th straight year of growth. The company in '83 obtained two major government contracts: one, for the development of a weapons system for the Air Force's F-15E jet fighters and the other, for upgrading anti-submarine training targets. It is also engaged in R&D for unmanned aerotechnics. The aerospace sector accounted for 7% of sales last year and 11% of operating income.

But tires remains to maintain. Goodyear reports that tires and other transportation products made up about 81% of its net sales in 1983 and 72% of operating income.

This year, Goodyear introduced the Eagle GT-4, a tire it touted as having been tested on the race track and developed for it. Think of what it can do on the street—Goodyear seems to be saying, if it did so well on the track.

Harry Wellin, an analyst with McDonald & Co., Cleveland, says best estimates are that Goodyear controls about 34% of the original equipment market; that is, the tires put on new cars at the plant. In the replacement field, he says, the figure is about 18%.

Goodyear's corporate image ads urge the public to buckle seat belts, to refrain from driving drunk and to keep vigilant about one's health.

Of Goodyear's $46.4 million in measured spending tracked by Leading National Advertisers, $30 million went in support of tires, down 17.1%; $1.7 million backed air springs, up 113.5%; $7.4 million supported service stores, up 16.2%, and $4.2 million supported corporate general promotion, up 89.5%.

Goodyear made major shifts in its media mix, increasing network radio to $5.4 million from only $1 million in 1982, and magazines rose 74.2% to $10.8 million. Network and spot tv dropped as a result—network to $17.8 million, down 34%, and spot to $7.8 million, down 29.7%.

Goodyear also last year devised an eight-minute test of long-form "infomercials," to see if they could be more effective than 30-second spots. These ads, instructions on how to buy tires, ran on cable systems.

Goodyear's net income for the first six months of this year was down a whopping 76%, largely because of a $101.8 million after-tax charge for a writedown of oil and gas reserves. It is spending about $890 million, the largest investment in its history, to build the "All American" pipeline from the California coast to the Texas Gulf Coast. The 1,738-mile project will be the first crude oil transportation pipeline to link the west and Gulf coasts.

Goodyear's Celeron Group ranks 22nd, according to the company, among the nation's independent operators in crude oil reserves. It is 44th among independent and major integrated oil companies in total reserves for '85, up from 51st the year before.

In the first six months of the new year, Goodyear Tire & Rubber had net income of $40.3 million after the writedown, declining from $172.4 million in 1985. First half sales were $4.98 billion, up 4.8%.

Goodyear recently announced it plans to double its capacity to make polyester resin, used in packaging for frozen dinners, soft drinks, tennis balls, cooking oils, toothpaste pumps, coffee creamer containers, cosmetics, pharmaceuticals and liquor.

The company will invest $30 million in a plant in Ft. Pleasant, W. Va. It thinks demand for polyester resin will more than double—to 1.5 billion pounds—by 1989. Campbell's line of Swanson Frozen Dinners was using aluminum trays, but has switched for many of its entrees to trays made of Goodyear's crystallized polyester resin. The company's vp and general manager, polyester division, says another bonus is that the resin's products are recyclable.

MILLIONS OF PEOPLE HAVE BEEN CURED OF A DISEASE MOST PEOPLE THINK IS INCURABLE.

We've made significant progress against most forms of cancer.

But, as far as many people are concerned, cancer is still a fatal disease.

There are nearly three million people who would disagree. People who have had cancer and are now cured.

For certain forms of cancer, the progress we've made is nothing short of miraculous.

With early detection and prompt treatment, the survival rate for Hodgkin's disease can be as high as 74%. Childhood leukemia: as high as 65%. Colon and rectal cancer: as high as 75%. Breast cancer: as high as 90%.

Today, one in every two people who get cancer will survive.

As far as we've come, we still have quite a way to go. And for that, we'd like your help.

There's only one place where cancer is a hopeless disease:

In your mind.

Grandwest USA, the U.S. subsidiary of Grand Metropolitan plc, London, capitalized on trends in the sagging hard liquor and tobacco markets while seeking diversification through the acquisition of several healthcare related businesses in 1985.

In support of these activities, Grandwest USA and other subsidiaries of the London-based parent increased advertising an incremental 1.2% to $176.7 million in 1985.

Subsidiary operations of Wentworth, W.I.-based Grandwest USA include Alpo Petfoods; Liggett & Myers Tobacco Products; Diversified Products Corp.; Atlantic Soft Drink Co. and Pepsi-Cola San Joaquin Bottling Co., two regional soft drink bottling operations; Children's World day care provider; Pearle Health Services, and Quality Care Inc., a home healthcare company.

The latter two companies, both acquired in 1985, further lessen Grandwest's reliance on sales of tobacco products. Pearle was acquired for an estimated $386 million in September from G.D. Searle & Co. and third-party investors. Quality Care came at a cost of $225 million.

In July, 1985, the company sold Pinkerton Tobacco Co., a manufacturer of smokeless tobacco, pipe tobacco and snuffs, to Svenska Tobaks AB for $107.8 million.

Grandwest had 1985 U.S. operating income of $80 million, down 46.7%, on sales of $1.9 billion, up 11.3%, for fiscal 1985 ended Sept. 30, 1985. These U.S. figures do not include sales and operating income generated by the wines and spirits of Paddington Corp. and Carillon Importers, subsidiaries of another operating division, International Distillers & Vintners.

IDV's U.S. sales contribution is estimated at $366 million, up 11% from the previous year, but operating income is not known.

Cigaret products, providing the largest portion of Grandwest's U.S. consumer products sales volume, showed a sales decline of about 3% to $686 million.

The biggest ad outlays go to promote Alpo, which showed more than $20 million in seven media measured by Leading National Advertisers, with dry dog food and virtually all of Alpo's snack products getting higher outlays for 1985 over 1984.

Alpo canned dog food maintained its market leadership with $205 million in sales, up 10.8% from last year, according to pet food sales figures compiled by John C. Maxwell, analyst with Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney, New York. Alpo beef-flavored dinner jumped from ninth to fourth place among 150 market brands on sales of $90 million, up nearly 16%. Alpo dropped its spending on canned dog food by 9.5% to $5.3 million from $10.8 million in 1984.

Part of Alpo's increase in sales and market share can be attributed to its decision to merge a West Coast dry food brand, Alpha, with the stronger Alpo brand, giving Alpo national distribution. Dry dog food, unlike its canned cousin, received measured media spending outlays of $8.5 million, up 21%.

The company also rolled out Alpo puppy food with $4.5 million in spending, mostly in magazines ($3.1 million) and spot tv ($2.7 million).

Market leader Ralston Purina Dog Chow lost ground in dollar market share as its sales declined 1% to $250 million. Ralston Purina Puppy Chow, in second place, also slipped nearly 1% to $153 million in sales, while Anderson Clayton & Co.'s Gaines Gravy Train sales slid 4% to $129 million.

Tabby, Alpo's entry in the canned cat food segment, had 1985 sales of about $4.3 million, up 31.7%. Contrary to industry rumors, Alpo has no intention of taking the Tabby brand national, says Gil Crompton, brand manager for Tabby. "We do quite well in the Northeast and Southeast where we have distribution. The cat food business is highly competitive right now. Our strength is in dog food. We won't get into a business until we know we can market it."

Also in 1985, Alpo purchased for nearly $7.75 million a pet food packaging plant in Pascagoula, Miss., from Sun Coast Foods.

Measured advertising spending on Liggett & Myers cigaret brands totaled $21 million, up 11.1%. The bulk of the division's measured advertising spending, 29.9 million, was devoted to Stride, a new off-price brand introduced in the last quarter of 1984.

Spending for Eve brands was measured at about $3.6 million, down 4.7%. Liggett also spent nearly $500,000 to revive the L&M brand, once one of the country's most popular.

About $2.6 million was spent on Red Man chewing tobacco through the first half of the year before the Pinkerton sale.

In the early 1980s, Liggett had established a profitable business in generic cigarettes. To fend off inroads made by Brown & Williamson's generic entry, in 1985 Liggett resorted to a $500,000 advertising and promotional campaign. The previous year, it sued B&W, contending that B&W's "O" on seal imitates the "Q" quality seal on the Liggett & Myers product.

Primarily because of competition in the generic market, Liggett & Myers' share of the total cigaret market fell from 5.7% to 5% in 1985, according to a market survey by Mr. Maxwell. Generics were Liggett's biggest seller with a 2.4% market share, off 16% from 1984.

L&M, despite a 14.5% decline in unit volume, held steady with a 0.5% share, which still shows considerable progress from the 0.1% share it had in 1981. Eve, which peaked at a 0.4% share in 1983, held a 0.2% share, while Lark, with a 13.9% decline in unit volume also had a 0.2% market share. Chesterfield kings rested at a 0.2% share, with Chesterfield lights at 0.1%, after a 10.7% decline in unit sales.

Liggett & Myers is sixth among major cigaret producers, far behind Philip Morris, which has a 39.9% market share. R.J. Reynolds was second with 31.6% of the market followed by Brown & Williamson, 11.9%; Lorillard, 8.1%, and American Tobacco Co., 7.5%.

Diversified Products Corp., which manufactures fitness equipment under the DP "Fit for Life" trademark, suffered a substantial decline in sales from 1984's record levels, according to Grandwest, which does not break out DP's results.

DP's measured advertising reflected this decline as it fell 16% to $6.3 million. The company continues promotional spending, such as sponsorship of touring professional golfers.

Pearle and its subsidiary operations spent $17.6 million in measured media in 1985, all of it on tv, compared with $15 million in 1984.

Grand Metropolitan's International Distillers & Vintners operates two U.S. importing and distribution businesses, Paddington and Carillon. IDV, while relying on its major brands, has made moves to acquire and develop products in line with the trend toward lighter and sweeter liquors. In particular, it has added to its line of cordials and cream liqueurs, as well as signing Cinzano vermouth via the parent company's acquisition of 25% of Cinzano International, Luxembourg.

Paddington, in addition to its two major brands, J&B Rare scotch and Baileys Irish Cream, handles Cinzano, Rumple Minze schnapps, Whitbread and Samboca Romano. Measured spending on Paddington brands totaled $10.4 million, led by $4.3 million for J&B, down 34% from 1984 levels. Spending also declined on Baileys, down 25% to $3.8 million, a steady decline from its 1982 all-support of $6.4 million.

The company created a separate operation, Morgan Furze Ltd., within Paddington to handle the marketing of Samboca Romano and James Catto's scotch brands.

J&B ranked 16th among top selling liquor brands in the U.S., according to Mr. Maxwell. J&B had ranked 14th in 1984, but depletions declined from 2.25 million cases to 2.23 million. An international survey conducted by Impact International ranks J&B as the eighth most popular brand, with worldwide depletions of about 5 million cases.

With 1 million cases depleted in 1985, Baileys remains the country's top selling cream liqueur, and the 38th most popular liquor brand overall, according to Mr. Maxwell.

Carillon, which handles Grand Marnier, Absolut vodka, Bombay gin, Le Grande Passion and Pur d'Or, spent $8.6 million in measured advertising, most backing Absolut ($3.6 million, up 50% from 1984) and Grand Marnier ($3.9 million, down 13%).

With Bombay gin, Carillon attempted to cash in on the popularity of premium gin products such as Tanqueray in a general market that has been declining by about 3% since the 1970s. Carillon spent $2.2 million on Bombay, up 57% from 1984 spending levels.

Carillon also has created a subsidiary, Celestic Marketing, to handle new brands. In 1986, it introduced Fernet Branca, an herbal-based alcoholic digestive, popular in Europe as a cure for the morning after a hard night. Celestic also imports Devinage, an upscale, French blanc champagne.

In addition to measured spending, Paddington and Carillon support their products through heavy promotional spending on point-of-purchase displays and event sponsorship.

advertising expenditures by nearly two-thirds in 1985 as it repositioned the Purex products bought through the acquisition in March, 1985, of Purex Industries. Reflecting the merger, Greyhound renamed the Armour-Dial division the Dial Corp.

Greyhound chairman John W. Teets announced at the time of the Purex purchase that he would boost ad spending, and he did—from $15.9 million in 1984 before the purchase to $7.1 million, primarily on Brillo soap pads, Sta-Puf fabric softener, and Purex bleach, household products and laundry detergent, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Much of the thrust in the first year of the purchase has been to combine the marketing, distribution and warehousing for Armour-Dial and Purex products, according to Katherine Stutts, vp-research for Dean Witter Reynolds in New York. The job in 1986 will be to combine manufacturing facilities, she says.

The new owners retained Purex's traditional market position as a bargain label, although packaging was redesigned "to give the products more uniform identification and to increase visibility on the market shelves," company spokesman Larry Lamb says.

Ad spending also went up for established Armour-Dial products. Measured spending for these—most going for Dial deodorant, Dial soap and Tone soap—came to $20.4 million, up 35.4%. Dial Corp.'s heaviest spending was lavished on Dial soap, which accounted for $16.4 million in measured media, up 37.4%. Dial commanded an estimated 30% share of the deodorant soap market in 1985. The division's other big performer, Tone, which had a 7% increase in sales volume in 1986, received measured media spending of $1 million, up 53.8%.

Net income for the entire consumer products group, which also includes Armour Star canned meats and other food products, rose 54%, to $40.4 million in 1985, with $11.8 million of that coming from Purex products. Without those products, net income for the former Armour-Dial division rose by 14% during the year. According to Greyhound, in 1985 Dial Corp. ranked fourth nationally in sales among laundry and household-product companies.

In 1985, the Dial division began national distribution from East Coast entry markets of Pure & Natural, a bar soap positioned against Procter & Gamble's Ivory. The company reports the soap, in its first few months of national distribution, won nearly a 4% market share. As the brand went national, measured advertising for Pure & Natural increased to $4.47 million in 1985 from $586,000 in 1984.

Imperial Leather, a premium soap that also was test marketed in 1985, did not fare as well. After disappointing results in Denver, Colo., and Grand Rapids, Mich., Imperial Leather was withdrawn from the market.

During 1986, Greyhound's consumer products division is testing several other new products, including a pump version of Dial soap and line extensions of Dutch brand items, including a detergent, bleach and fabric softener.

In late 1985, Armour Star introduced Lunch Buckets, nine entrees in plastic, microwavable packages that were test marketed in Southland Corp.'s 7-Eleven chain. The company says Lunch Buckets have performed well, and it will expand distribution during 1986. The company also is testing a new French bread pizza under the Elio's pizza label, a label that came into Greyhound's possession as part of the Purex purchase. Greyhound says it is considering extending the line into frozen Italian pasta specialties.

Greyhound's scheduled bus service remained the heart of the conglomerate. Net income for the transportation group, of which Greyhound Lines is the largest part, came to $47.2 million in 1985, compared with $46.4 million for the consumer products division.

It should be noted, however, that the $47.2 million in net income includes $19.1 million of net gains on sales of Greyhound Lines facilities. These sales were part of a continuing effort to thrust Greyhound's scheduled bus service to fit the marketplace of late 1980s. That net income compares favorably with 1984's $28.4 million, of which $4.2 million came from sales of facilities.

Such a reduction draws a positive response from analysts. "Greyhound Lines carried 30 million passengers in 1985," says Mr. Kelly, analyst with Goldman Sachs. "That number was 40 million five years ago. Even though the decline in the bus business bottom out at 20 million passengers, the company can make money serving that base if it is the appropriate size."

Greyhound Lines has been caught in severe competition on its long hauls by low airline fares. On the other hand, local bus services have cut deeply into its short-haul revenues, but it is in the short-haul business that Greyhound plans to concentrate, according to Ralph Borland, senior director, marketing. "Our natural niche is in transporting people less than 500 miles," Mr. Borland says. "All our strategies are aimed at offering the cheapest possible transportation to passengers on the shorter hauls."

Greyhound Line's most dramatic move came in May, 1986, when it split into four regional entities in an effort to compete more successfully with local carriers. The split created Eastern Greyhound Lines Co., based in New York; Central Greyhound Lines Co., Chicago; Southern Greyhound Lines Co., Atlanta, and Western Greyhound Lines Co., San Francisco.

Mr. Borland says the move will "return Greyhound Lines to its structure of the '60s, rather than the central, monolithic structure it has become. Regional carriers will bring decision-making closer to the marketplace—it can be faster and more flexible in dealing with the competition."

The newly reorganized division's first advertising campaign was launched June 22, 1986. A national "Money Saver" campaign was unveiled nationally and tied to inexpensive fares on short routes in each region. Each regional office supported the national marketing with local media buys.

A second leg of the campaign broke in July when Greyhound Lines began offering a $59 one-way Money Saver fare to anywhere in the U.S. served by the bus line. The promotion seemed as much a means to recapture business siphoned off by low airline fares as it was a reaction to a major competitor. Continental Trailways, which introduced unlimited travel on its system for $10 a day with minimum of 15 days.

Mr. Borland says Greyhound Lines advertising still is going centrally through Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt in Dallas, but each newly created regional company has its own account exec in the agency. The advertising and marketing budget have remained stable, Mr. Borland adds, noting the budget is on a scheduled reduction plan limited to planned shrinkage in the rest of the division.

Ad estimates that ad expenditures for Greyhound Lines in 1985 were down by more than 21% compared with 1984. Media advertising measured by LNA showed a reduction of only 4.2% to slightly less than $4 million.

Greyhound Lines spent those dollars on highly segmented audiences, following an established policy based on research showing that the most loyal bus riders are blacks, Hispanics, college students, the military and senior travelers. Mr. Borland says Greyhound Lines plans to reach out during 1986 to yet another demographic group, the elderly, noting that "currently only 8% of our ridership is per-ile other than oil."

Mr. Teets' background is in the services and food services division of Greyhound, and recent purchases seem to reflect his interest in building that division. In February, 1986, the division purchased Cassano's, a fast food pizza business based in Dayton, O. Cost was about $5 million for the $20 million-a-year business, estimates analyst Mr. Kelly.

In May, 1986, the division paid less than $10 million, Mr. Kelly says, for Aeroplex Stores from jewelry retailer Zale Corp., Dallas. Aeroplex operates 44 retail gift shops in airports and hotels throughout the country and had 1985 revenues of $61 million. Aeroplex becomes part of the Florida Export Group, which operates duty-free shops in airports and on Caribbean cruise liners. A subsidiary of the Florida Export Group, Premier Cruise Lines doubled its fleet with the launching in April, 1986, of the S/S Oceanic, which joined the S/S Royale in offering three and four-day Caribbean cruises.

GTE Corp. last year launched an all-out marketing push to build its Sprint long-distance service. It plowed ad dollars into the service—from $100.5 million in 1984 to $135.5 million, in total advertising, including a new expenditure of $4 million for Sprint long lines for business, according to LNA measured media—and attracted 70% more customers.

User base for Sprint expanded to 2.4 million residential and business users by April, 1986. But that expansion, with its increase in marketing expenses, added to higher access charges for connections to local telephone exchanges and the depreciation of Sprint, contributing to an operating loss of $245 million for GTE's communications services group, compared with a gain of $67 million in 1984.

On the company-wide books, GTE took a $1.3 billion after-tax charge in 1985's financial results because of moves involving Sprint and a proposed joint venture with Siemens AG of West Germany.

Then in January, 1986, GTE merged Sprint and GTE Telenet with United Telecommunications Inc.'s voice and data operations to form a new company, US Sprint Communications Co., based in Westwood, Kan.

US Sprint went into operation July 1 with a 4% share of the $30 billion long-distance market, behind AT&T's 83% and MCI's 8%. While its share of market is still relatively small, the new company has a technological boost through combining both companies' experience and investment in fiber optics and digital switches. TV spots which broke in August as part of a $100 million advertising effort came from J. Walter Thompson USA, San Francisco, previously Sprint's agency.

Overall GTE went after the spot markets in 1985. Among the 10 measured media, the total of which was up 50.8%, GTE doubled its spot tv spending to $57.2 million, from $28 million, and increased its spot radio to $8 million from $4.4 million in 1984. Network tv dipped 12% to $14.7 million.

Philip C. Stevens, director of corporate advertising, says following Sprint's departure "you'll see our numbers go way down." He expected to major shifts in advertising for remaining operations. A campaign for GTE's telephone companies moved into a new phase with the theme "Quality service from quality people."

Robert Morris, analyst with Prudential Bache, San Francisco, says, "The main thrust seems to be with the phone companies. They are concentrating on where they've had their successes. Phones and telecommunications are not bad businesses to be in. GTE is really going through a transition back to what it knows best."

In fact, its strong communications products segment (digital switching, PABX systems, transmission and phone equipment), which accounted for 17% of total sales in 1985, tripled its pretax profit on a 11% sales increase in the second quarter of the current fiscal year, while communications services group (largely Sprint) had an operating loss of $50 million. Over-all GTE profit for the quarter rose 8.3% to $308.6 million, on sales of $4.2 billion, up 7.5%. For the half, profits were up 6% to $591.5 million, on sales of $8.15 billion, up 7.3%.

GTE's major advertising items after Sprint is its ongoing "Gee! (No, GTE)" corporate campaign. Measured spending in 1985 was $17.5 million, up 16.7%. Mr. Stevens says the campaign has moved into a more pragmatic, products-and-services stage beyond name recognition.

GTE boosted at spending on Wubinet, which operates cellular mobile radio telephone systems in nine metropolitan areas, from $388,000 to $1.8 million in 1985, according to LNA.

Wubinet is part of GTE's largest segment—telephone operating group. The group accounted for $22.93 billion (up 12.4% from 1984) out of total operating income of $22.98 billion in 1985, on an increase of 10.1% in sales.

Other areas showed declines in ad spending. Phone Mart retail stores declined in spending from $2.5 million to $437,000; spending on GTE telephones fell from $2.1 million to $367,000.

In the new products arena, GTE's electrical products segment made improvements in its soft-white incandescent light bulbs, raising life span 5% without decreasing light output. A major advertising campaign for the Sylvania brand name used the Mr. Light character.

Spending on Sylvania brand home light bulbs jumped to $6.5 million from $3.7 million. Using the line, "Where the best comes to light," the Mr. Light campaign will continue at the same spending level, says Joseph F. Belle Isle, vp and corporate account supervisor at the agency of record, Doyle Dane Bernbach.

In other joint ventures, GTE and Siemens AG of West Germany announced in July an unnamed new venture, with 80% Siemens ownership, that would involve GTE's transmission systems and public switching and business systems in the U.S. and abroad. GTE also has formed a joint venture with Fujitsu Ltd. of Japan to market both companies' private branch exchange equipment here and abroad. Operations will begin in January.

Gulf & Western dropped "Industries" from its corporate name this past year, it signified the completion of a far-reaching restructuring program inaugurated by G&W chairman-ceo Martin S. Davis in 1982 to focus the company's operations in financial services, publishing and information services and entertainment.

Total advertising figures for 1984 and 1985 are viewed to reflect the sale of G&W's consumer and industrial products group to Wickes Cos. in September, 1985. The sale, for $1 billion in cash and the assumption of $72 million in long-term debt, included clothing licenses under the Calvin Klein, Liz Claiborne and Jonathan Logan labels and Simmons mattresses, automotive parts distribution and manufacturing, and accounted for approximately 50% of its measured ad spending.

Gulf & Western's net earnings for fiscal 1985 totaled $2234.5 million, up compared with $1077.2 million in fiscal 1984, excluding income from the sale of securities that contributed an additional $32.7 million to 1984 earnings. Fiscal 1985 results included earnings of $129.6 million from continuing operations and $104.7 million from discontinued operations (principally the consumer and industrial products group). The prior year's net income included earnings of $128.8 million from continuing operations and $104.1 million from discontinued operation.

During 1985, G&W's financial services group reported another stellar performance. Comprised of Associates First Capital Corp., whose principal operating subsidiary is Associates Corp. of North America (The Associates), the nation's third largest independent finance company, the financial services group reported a 20% increase in operating income to $2332 million in fiscal 1985 as gross revenue (not consolidated with G&W's sales total) increased 21% to $1.4 billion. Those gains continued into the first half of 1986, with strong gains coming from the consumer lending and commercial finance activities.

G&W's purchase of Prentice-Hall, the nation's largest publisher of college textbooks and a leading publisher of business and professional materials, for about $710 million in December, 1984, and in June, 1985, purchase of Ginn & Co., a leading elementary and high school textbook publisher, for about $310 million, enabled G&W's publishing and information services group to hold leadership positions in most of the major industry segments. G&W's publishing and information services group was formed in March, 1985, and it now comprises Simon & Schuster and its family of companies.

Publishing and information services made up of six operating units—trade, reference, higher education, school, professional information and international—had operating income of $79.5 million on net sales of $663.6 million in fiscal 1985, compared with $30.6 million and $265.7 million, respectively, the prior year. Net sales in fiscal 1986 are expected to approach $1 billion, reflecting the operations for a full year of Prentice-Hall and Ginn & Co.

Simon & Schuster plans to broaden the variety of products it offers and the number of customers served through planned internal growth as well as acquisitions. In the first six months of fiscal 1986, the group generated $297.4 million in revenues, up 18% from $302 million the prior year. Operating income rose 12% to $23.8 million.

Paramount Pictures is the main attraction in G&W's entertainment group and is the one big-ticket advertiser remaining onboard after G&W's restructuring. Paramount owns one-third of the USA Network, an advertiser-supported basic cable tv service, and publishes music through its Famous Music Corp. The group's other business segment includes among others Madison Square Garden Corp., which operates Madison Square Garden Center, its professional sports teams and MSG Network, the country's oldest and largest regional cable tv sports network.

G&W's entertainment group was unable to match the group's record-breaking fiscal performance generated by four motion-picture box office hits in fiscal 1984. With only one comparable success in fiscal 1985 and because of the adverse impact of videogames operations that have been shut down, the group's operating income declined 37.7% to $68.5 million as sales dropped 16.7% to $1 billion. Aside from the rest of the group, Paramount's own operating income was $77.8 million, compared with 1984's record $110.5 million. Sales amounted to $580 million, compared with $1 billion the previous year.

Madison Square Garden provided results almost equal to last year's performance, but the videogame operations of Sega Enterprises, now closed, caused a substantial deficit.

Paramount has several major features in production and plans to release 16 to 18 films in fiscal 1986, compared with 12 in fiscal 1985.

Total measured media spending for Paramount movies in 1985 was $23 million, up 11.6% from 1984. While most releases in its 1985 repertoire received about $1.5 million in measured media backing, "Young Sherlock Entries" got $2.5 million and "Witness" received $2.1 million.

Except for "Beverly Hills Cop" and "Witness," revenues from fiscal 1985 releases were disappointing, with "King David" and "Explorers" both incurring major losses. According to Variety, "Beverly Hills Cop," released in December, 1984 grossed a total of $235 million at the box office, placing it ninth on the list of all-time hits. "Witness," a February, 1985, release with Harrison Ford, grossed $68 million at the domestic box office. Recent results from Paramount's tv operations were more than offset by a decline in motion picture revenues.

The group's tv operations benefited from a strong network production schedule, which included "Cheers," "Family Ties," "Webster" and "MacGyver." Syndication revenues from "Happy Days," "Boom Buddies" and "Star Trek," in addition to gains in home video, pay tv and the international tv distribution of "Raiders of the Lost Ark" also contributed to the segment's gains.

G&W's entertainment group's revenues for the first six months of fiscal 1986, which ended April 30, declined 6% to $501.8 million while operating income rose 36% to $57.3 million. The earnings reflected the favorable impact of the marketing by the motion picture division of a first-run portfolio package of 25 feature films for tv syndication, the continued growth of the home video operations which benefited from the releases of "Witness" and "Teen Wolf," among others pictures. The earnings increase also reflects the recognition of license fees for "Flashdance" and "48 Hours," the home video release of "Beverly Hills Cops" and the improvement of the Canadian theater operations because of higher concession sales and lower operating costs.

These improvements over the first six-month period more than offset the decline from the motion picture division because of the lack of a comparable blockbuster to "Beverly Hills Cop" in the prior period.

Paramount's early 1986 release of "Poetry in Pink," with box office grosses totaling over $40 million, and "Gung Ho," with box office results of $37 million, spurred the motion picture division's stronger gains. With the release of "Top Gun" in May ($119 million by mid-August) and "Ferris Bueller's Day Off" ($56 million by mid-August) Variety's Art Murphy has identified Paramount the industry's leader, capturing 16.6% of the moviegoing audience. "Top Gun" may be the biggest hit of the year.

In 1986, Paramount Home Video entered the 8mm video marketplace through a nonexclusive distribution agreement with Sony Corp. of America. Paramount purchased 26 screens of the Trans-Lux theater chain for about $15 million. Paramount TV's international distribution division is exploring international rights sales of Madison Square Garden-owned tv properties. In April, 1986, G&W announced plans for the construction of a new Madison Square Garden one block south of the new Jacob Javits Convention Center. Completion date will be fall 1990.

G&W purchased Silver Burdett Co., an elementary school textbook publisher, from SFN Cos., Glenview, Ill., for about $125 million in March, 1986. In May, 1986, S&S combined Silver Burdett and Ginn & Co. into Silver, Burdett & Ginn, which will consolidate all S-A publishing operations. Simon & Schuster has acquired Van Nostrand Reinhold's general interest trade titles in nine categories. In March, 1986, G&W sold its Delair and Resource Systems International units, which provide training programs for industry, to National Education Corp., Newport Beach, Cal., for $100 million.

The Associates formed a new affiliate, Associates Real Estate Financial Services Co., to market the company's residential real estate activities. In May, AmeriTrust Corp., Cleveland, purchased the lending division of Associates Commercial Corp. Terms of the sale were not disclosed.

Product diversity in 1985 allowed Hasbro Inc. to become the nation's leading toy manufacturer—inching ahead of longtime industry leader Mattel Corp. with $1.2 billion in net revenues.

Hasbro, which recorded revenues of only $105 million just five years ago, is made up of Hasbro toys, Milton Bradley games and Playskool (the latter two were acquired in 1984). It spent an estimated $113.4 million in advertising in 1985, up 33%, with $20 million attributed to international advertising.

In 1985, Hasbro merged its previously separate Hasbro and Playskool preschool lines into one comprehensive line. Products including Mr. Potato Head, Mr. Buddy and Mickey Mouse Talking Phone, which previously were part of the separate Hasbro preschool division, are now a part of Playskool. All toys in this division carried the ad theme "Feeling good about the Hasbro years."

In early 1986, Hasbro completed the purchase of certain assets of the Child Guidance preschool line from CBS Inc., New York. As a result, Hasbro was able to add crib activity toys and The Big Mouth Singers, Walt Disney and Sesame Street licenses to the Playskool name.

Another segment of the Playskool umbrella is the new Tommee Tippee Playskool line, which grew out of Hasbro's purchase of Glenoit Infant Systems in 1983. The line was backed with $5 million in advertising support and features bibs, feeding accessories, safety items and infant wear. Print advertising for the line ran in women's service magazines, and two 30-second tv spots featured Good Morning America co-host Joan Lunden and tv patrons Alex Karras and Susan Clark.

Hasbro introduced several new lines in its girls' division in 1985. The most successful to date is Jem—a contemporary version of Mattel's classic Barbie doll. In 1986, Hasbro promoted Jem with $7 million to $10 million in ad support and the theme "Truly Outrageous!" Jem also appeared in the form of a weekly syndicated cartoon series in 1986.

Hasbro introduced a number of accessories in 1986 to complement the Jem line. Top sellers include an fm radio/cassette player that opens up to reveal a star's dressing room, a sports car or a concert stage. Also in 1986, Milton Bradley introduced three Jem games that interweave rock music with board game play.

"Get in Shape, Girl!" a fitness program for young girls, also was introduced in 1985. The line, which consists of exercise cassette tapes, child-size exercise gear and fashionable accessories, was complemented by four new sets of gear in 1986. The line was promoted in 1985 by Olympic gymnast Mary Lou Retton.

Also in 1985, Hasbro's girls' division introduced Real Baby, a doll that has the look and feel of a "real baby," and launched line extensions for My Little Pony. My Little Pony was the No. 2 selling toy in England last year.

Hasbro's boys' division is primarily made up of two top-selling toys: G.I. Joe and Transformers.

Despite complaints from various organizations requesting that violence-themed toys be removed from the market, the G.I. Joe action figure line in 1985 represented 13% of the company's total revenues. Sales for the line were $130 million.

Though up against stiff competition from Tonka Corp.'s Gobots, Mattel's Masters of the Universe collection and Matchbox Toys (USA) Ltd.'s Voltron, Transformers remain the leader in the transformable toy market valued at $500 million. Sales from the line more than doubled in 1985—a year after the toy's introduction. Hasbro's Transformers rang up sales of about $300 million, just over 50% of the charters, according to the company. GoBots, No. 2 in sales with $130 million, gave Tonka a 26% share.

Hasbro introduced Transformers to the market with a $5 million ad campaign and a daily syndicated animated series. In 1985, Tonka spent $10 million advertising GoBots, but a series based on the toy wasn't introduced until six month after the line debuted.

Inhumanoids, a new Hasbro entry in 1986, is being supported by a $3-$5 million ad campaign, with the theme "The evil that lies within," and a weekly syndicated animated program.

Hasbro's revenues from its plush toy division was $74 million in 1985, up from $12 million in 1983 when the company acquired the Mickey Mouse, Big Bird, Miss Piggy, Kermit and Raggedy Ann properties from Knickerbocker Toy Co.

Wuzzles are plush fantasy animals that Hasbro also introduced in 1985 via a license from Walt Disney Productions. The toys combine the features of two animals and are also available in a vinyl "squeeze toy" version, board games and puzzles.

Hasbro's Milton Bradley division introduced 35 new games and puzzles in 1985, the most popular being Bed Bugs (an action game), Last Word (a word game) and A Question of Scruples (for adults).

In February, 1986, Hasbro selected Chicago-based Needham Harper Worldwide as the company's second agency of record. Needham handles $15 million in new business assignments, including Hasbro's Christmas 1986 entry, Yakity Yaks—talking bears and monkeys with 400-word vocabularies. Griffin Bacal, New York, remains Hasbro's primary agency with an estimated $100 million in billings.

H.J. Heinz Co. continued its cost-pleasc on cost-cutting and new product development, on which it spent $50 million in 1985, while celebrating 1985 its 100th anniversary of overseas product distribution.

When it came to marketing, tradition ruled as Heinz tomato ketchup once again got the most ad support of any Heinz brand with $12.4 million in network, spot and cable tv buys, a 27% drop from 1984. Heinz ketchup now shows a 30% share of the $580 million market for the first time last year.

In 1986, the company introduced a new 64-oz. bottle, as well as Lite ketchup, a product with half the calories and one-third less salt than Heinz' reg-

INFLUENCE:

Toledo's newspaper has had a strong community influence for 150 years.

The Blade is more than a newspaper. It is a community institution . . . investing itself in the economic, cultural and political life . . . working to set priorities . . . sparking ideas . . . using its influence to help great things happen.

Linked as it is to world markets by the St. Lawrence Seaway, the Port of Toledo is Ohio's No. 1 port. It has the largest Foreign Trade Zone on the Great Lakes.

In 1855 The Blade played a major role in the formation of the Toledo-Lucas County Port Authority. Through this self-governing entity, Toledo taxpayers hold title to property, facilities and equipment worth many millions of dollars.

The Blade's strong influence makes it an effective catalyst for community achievement. It's an influence we share with advertisers in our 14-county market. Sunday coverage, 82%; daily coverage, 67%.

Propelled by record sales and operating income in 1985, Hershey Foods Corp. continued to build from its strengths in the confectionery, package food and restaurant business to become a major diversified food company.

Hershey acquired a chain of 12 Franklin restaurants in northeastern Pennsylvania, while divesting itself of lagging Cory Food Services and Cory Canada.

Even with the emphasis on diversification, Hershey's chocolate and confection business still accounted for 67% of total company sales, down only slightly from 68% in 1984. The group's operating income is even more dominant—71.7% of a company-wide $267.1 million in operating income (minus general corporate expenses).

In the battle for dominance in the $8 billion confectionery market, Hershey pulled almost even with its chief competitor, Mars Inc. Hershey Chocolate Co. and Mars together hold one-third of the total confectionery market, while the top nine companies account for about 50% of the business, according to Hershey figures.

The two companies split about 70% share of the candy bar market, with Hershey closing to an approximate 35.5% share, up from 32.6% five years ago. In the same period Mars has dropped to a 36% share, from an estimated 40%. Peter Paul Cadbury and Nestle each hold just under 11% of the bar market share.

Hershey continued its attack in the bar wars in July, 1986, when it announced a weight increase for a number of its standard bars, such as Kit Kat, Reese, Hershey's milk chocolate, Crackel, Skor and Mr. Goodbar, while holding the line on wholesale prices.

"Once prices have been increased, as it can be expected that other producers will follow Hershey," says market analyst Leonard Teitelbaum of Merrill Lynch, New York. "The strategy of increasing size without raising price has been used before. This time Hershey is taking the lead. They see this as a way to improve consumer perception of the price/value ratio. That's sure to be better for consumer demand," he says.

Value has a strong bearing in Hershey's push to a more mature, value-conscious market for products such as Hawaiian Punch chocolate rolls and Skor. They have been positioned as taste treats for adults. The Golden Premium candy line of premium bar and solitaire products was rolled out nationally in spring of 1985.

The bulk of Hershey's measured advertising spending was devoted to promotion of its confectionery lines. The company spent $67.4 million in measured media, according to seven media main measured by Leading National Advertisers, with $62.2 million or 92% spent on promoting confectionery products. An additional $16.5 million in unmeasured advertising was spent on coupons and promotional advertising.

Measured spending increased mainly in several individual products, including $18.3 million for Hershey's candy bars, up 14% from 1984. Hershey's miniatures, up 15.5% to $1.35 million; kiss candy, up 13% to $2.15 million, and Reese's Peanut Butter Cups, up 4.3% to $7.5 million.

On the down side, Hershey cut back in measured spending on chocolate milk $0.2 million). Production was discontinued in 1985 of Take Five, another adult-oriented bar, after a four-year regional test.

During 1985, Hershey had rough going in the estimated $4.6 billion granola bar market. Despite a 45% increase in measured spending (up to $6.3 million) and award-winning creative for its New Trail entries, Hershey's market share in the competitive category slipped from 7% in 1984 to 4%. Quaker Oats continues to lead with a 50% share in 1985, up from 45% in 1984. Other key market players include General Mills at 23% versus 28% in 1984; Ralston Purina, 7%, up from slightly more than 5%, along with Carnation and Kellogg, both holding steady at 6%.

The granola category has endured radical change in the product—from a crunchy, grain-based "health food," to a soft confection approaching a candy bar in taste and "pleasure"—and Hershey appears unscathed by the product changes and stiff competition. It introduced three new chocolate-covered New Trail flavors in early 1986.

Mr. Teitelbaum says Hershey's share has moved back up to about 9% in 1986. But other producers, including Frito-Lay and Mars, are contemplating entering the category. "It's woefully crowded already. Companies will have to examine their profit margins and decide if it's really worth it to be in the category," he says.

While attracting consumer attention, it is hoped, Ogilvy & Mather's spots showing children lip-syncing "Ba and "Ma chants in praise of New Trail have drawn scathing remarks and in Cannes, where the campaign received a 1985 Silver Lion. Another Hershey agency, Dovle Dane Bernbach, New York, removed an Effie for its work on Hershey's chocolate syrup.

Hershey made other attempts to grow in name before the panic to everything into licensing agreements with several toy and children's clothing manufacturers in 1985.

Hershey-owned Friendly Ice Cream Co. celebrated its 50th anniversary in 1985 by forging ahead in its geographic expansion campaign. In addition to the acquisition of the Franklin chain, which will continue to operate under its present name and menu, Friendly added 40 new restaurants. At yearend, it operated 752 units in 17 states. Friendly, with sales amounting for 24% of Hershey, up from 22% in 1984, accounted for 11.2% of operating income, as measured ad spending was $3.1 million, up 7%.

Though primarily concentrated in the Northeast and Midwest, Friendly, which counts on ice cream items for 47% of its sales volume, is expanding into the South. The company plans to operate 20 Friendly restaurants in the Washington, D.C., area by the end of 1986 and have another 20 in operation in central Florida by the end of 1987, a Friendly's spokesman says.

In addition to expanding the Friendly concept, an effective restaurant unit in Howard Johnson's, the company is seeking to acquire strong regional chains such as Franklin's in order to gain a broader base of customers.

Hershey Pasta Group, including American Beauty, Delmonico, Light 'n' Fluffy, P&R, San Giorgio and Skinner, are the mainstays in the "other food products" category that accounted for 9% of Hershey sales and 4.1% of operating profit.

The 1984 acquisition of American Beauty pasta from Pillsbury propelled Hershey into market leadership of the estimated $852 million dry pasta market. In 1985, Hershey maintained a 11.8% market share, down from 17.2% in 1984. Other players include CPC International (Mueller's) at 15.6%, up slightly from 15.5% in 1984; Borden (Creamette, Kraft) 14.8%, up from 11.9%, and General Foods (Ronzoni) 8.8%, up from 8.7%. Over the course of 1985, Coca-Cola Co. and McKesson pulled out of the market along with Pillsbury.

Although not advertised heavily, pasta brands measured measured spending of $1.5 million, up 51%. The pasta group unveiled several new products including Skinner's Lone Star pasta for sale in Texas. Rainbow Twirls was launched under the Light 'n' Fluffy and American Beauty brands. Hershey also tested Sun Giorgio spaghetti sauce.

In November, 1985, Hershey divested itself of money-losing Cory Food Services and Cory of Canada. The subsidiaries were sold to A.E.A. Food Services for an undisclosed price. Hershey incurred an aftertax loss of about $7 million as a result of the sale.

Hershey's cocoa connection

Cocoa beans, grown largely in West Africa, fluctuate widely in price. The International Cocoa Agreement often minimizes price fluctuations by forward purchasing and by the trading in cocoa futures contracts. Higher prices forced Hershey's in January, 1986, to raise its retail price for a standard bar from 25¢ to 40¢.

American Honda Motor Co., the third leading Japanese auto manufacturer in Japan and third largest auto importer in the U.S., increased its U.S. unit car sales by 6.8% in 1985 as it furthered its largest ad expenditures into a revamped Accord line and introduced its first luxury car, the Legend.

American Honda is a wholly owned subsidiary of Honda Motor Co., Tokyo, which posted record earnings of $[illegible] million on worldwide sales of $[illegible] billion for the 1986 fiscal year ended Feb. 28, 1986. Figures for both 1986 and 1985 fiscal years were converted from yen to dollars at the rate of $1[illegible].55=¥[illegible].50.

Worldwide unit sales of Honda autos rose 9.3% to a record 1,366,000, an increase the company attributes to new model introductions and expanded overseas production. In the U.S., sales of imported Honda cars in 1985 rose to a record 410,403—[illegible],170 of the best-selling Civics, [illegible],466 Accords, 77,930 Preludes and 52,861 Civic CRXs—an 8.4% jump over the 378,329 imported units sold in 1984.

The 145,879 U.S.-made units at Honda's Marysville, O., plant gave it a U.S. sales total of 592,309 units, up from a total of 508,420 cars sold domestically in 1984. The company is building a $240 million expansion unit in Marysville plant to double the capacity to 360,000. Accords and compact Civics by 1988, in line with stated intentions of increasing U.S. auto sales to 11 million by 1990.

It is the U.S. production that is enabling Honda to meet its current and future sales goals in North America. Honda's auto production capacity in Japan is presently at or near capacity.

Honda is second only to Toyota in total sales (from imports and domestic production) among auto importers in the U.S. General Motors, Ford and Chrysler in that order still lead in over-all domestic car sales. (Nissan ranks Honda in over-all vehicle sales when compact pickup trucks, a category in which Honda has no competitive product, are figured into the total.)

Including its U.S.-built Accords, Honda's share of the total U.S. auto market in 1985 was 5%, up from 4.9% in 1984, third behind Toyota with 5.7% and Nissan at 5.1%. Mazda accounted for a 2.4% share.

Honda's share of the import market for 1985 stood at 19.5%, up from 19.2% in 1984 and third behind Toyota at 22.4% and Nissan at 21.3%, followed by Mazda at 8.4%. Imports accounted for 27.6% of the total U.S. market in 1985, up from 24.97% in 1984, but not quite at the all-time high of 28.57% in 1982.

Honda's big auto marketing effort focuses on the revamped Accord line unveiled in October, which accounted for more than $2b million in measured media expenditures in 1985, most of it in network tv ($15.5 million) and magazines ($8.4 million). Honda showcased the Accords—five new front-wheel-drive models—in tv spots themed "What will he" and using actor Burgess Meredith as the voiceover.

Print for the 1986 models included a two-page insert using the same theme in major newsweeklies and an array of monthly publications. National newspaper advertising was solely in U.S.A. Today.

Honda also introduced new Civic and Prelude models, of which the Civic accounted for $13.2 million in measured media, compared with a $.1 million expenditure for Prelude.

But the big news in Honda's auto marketing came in the spring of 1986 when the company entered the luxury segment of the market for the first time with two upscale products from its new Acura division. These were the Legend, positioned at $16,000 to $20,000, and the Integra, a sporty notchback at $9,500 to $12,000.

The Acura campaign, budgeted at $20 million for 1986 (40% Legend and 60% Integra, with a 50/50 split between tv and magazines), began in late March with an eight-page spread in national newsweeklies. Prime-time spots on network tv followed just before the showroom introductions in late March. The Japanese-made cars are being sold by a dealer network that operates independently of existing Honda dealerships.

Honda continued to maintain its dominant position in the world motorcycle market, holding a 46.4% share of the U.S. market in 1985, down slightly from 48.7% a year earlier. It was followed by Yamaha at 19.9% (down from 20.5% in '84), Kawasaki at 14.9% (up from 10.2%), Suzuki at 10.1% (down from 10.2%) and Harley-Davidson at 7% (up from 5.5%).

Honda also led the competition in sales of all-terrain vehicles in 1985 with a 45.5% share, down from 70.3% a year earlier. Other ATV market shares for 1985 were Yamaha, 15.8%; Suzuki, 13.4%; and Kawasaki, 6.5%. In scooters, Honda also held a commanding lead with a 41% share, up from 35.7% in 1984, followed by Yamaha at 18% and Vespa at 10.1%.

The Japanese importer owns a 15.6% unit share of the combined motorcycle, ATV and scooter markets in the U.S., all of which account for unit sales of more than 700,000 annually. Honda also is expanding its U.S. market for lawn mowers, generators, outboard motors and power products.

Power equipment advertising, mostly in magazines, exceeded $3 million in measured media in 1985, with the creative effort concentrated on aggressive support of individual products. Ads emphasized the quality of products at the upper end of the price structure. A new tv spot featuring an intimate dinner party shows that Honda's power generator can be used by consumers other than campers.

Honda introduced its 1985 Rebel motorcycle, a small entry-level 250cc street bike priced at $1,298, with a $5 million ad push in the spring of 1985. The company followed with similar backing for a 450cc Rebel model, priced at $1,498, early in 1986. The year ended with Honda spending an estimated $20 million on motorcycle advertising, most of it in network and spot tv and magazines. Combined annual budget for motorcycles, scooters and ATVs is estimated at more than $40 million.

Tv was also the main support for Honda's motorized scooters, as well as youth-oriented consumer magazines, which were portrayed as hip, trendy and fashionable in a campaign featuring singer Lou Reed. Scooter advertising, estimated at more than $8 million in 1985, went even higher this year as Honda used Chicago Bears quarterback Jim McMahon, comedian Sandra Bernhard and jazz trumpeter Miles Davis in a new $10 million tv campaign to pitch Honda Elite scooters. New print and tv ads also introduced a high-end scooter, the Helix, which lists for $2,598.

Major introduction in Honda's ATVs was a new line of four-wheeled vehicles—the Fourtrax—a category that has been growing in popularity over three-wheeled models. The $2 million-plus campaign ran primarily on tv. ATVs accounted for $7.2 million in measured media in 1985.

Honda continues to invest heavily in U.S. production. Honda is building a $42 million plant in Anna, O., that will make plastic parts. The company's new $13 million lawn mower plant in North Carolina reached its full capacity of 120,000 units in July, 1985. Honda started production in July, 1985, of motorcycles at a newly constructed $30 million plant in Anna, O. It is nearing completion of a $40 million expansion to the plant to produce Civic engines by the fall of 1986.

Point of Purchase Radio® is the only proven in-store broadcast network that moves product off the shelf and over to the register — where it belongs.

And to prove it, POP Radio supplies free sales tracking research generated from a permanent panel of point of sale "scanner" stores. This monthly research lets you monitor consumer take away in units and dollars, confirming POP Radio's phenomenal ability to move product.

Unlike live radio, POP Radio can deliver customized brand and chain messages right in the store. Whether its Peoples, Fay's, Thrifty, Eckerd, Adams, or Gray Drug Fair, POP Radio builds in-store awareness with the most qualified audience possible: shoppers at the point of sale. And since 2/3 of all brand decisions are made in the store, a POP Radio message can direct your customers to specific aisle or shelf displays, announce price features, and most importantly, influence a customer's final purchase decision.

So if you're looking for the most effective and proven way to reach customers in store and move product out of the store, call Bill Carroll. We're already moving your competition.

George A. Hormel & Co., plagued by a union strike that drew the National Guard to its home plant in Austin, Minn., substantially hedged its advertising and continued its transformation from meat packer to food processor.

Hormel's 1985 ad expenditures, amounting to a 50% increase over the previous year, represented the acme of annual big budget increases in advertising the past five years at Hormel, starting with $17 million in 1981. Year-end 1986 ad spending should remain near $70 million, says a company spokesman, loosely tying advertising to profits, which already have been affected by startup costs associated with the end of the strike.

The only 1985 Hormel advertising shuffle occurred in September, when the $5 million Brolett & Browneit pork sausage account was switched to Bates Paragon, Minneapolis, from BBDO.

Hormel's fiscal returns—earnings that shot up 30.4% in 1985 on sales that increased 3.3%—continued strong in the first half of fiscal 1986 when Hormel net income grew 4.7% to $15.2 million on sales of $823 million, up 29.8%. However, earnings in the second quarter jumped 26% to $9.1 million from 1985, a rise Hormel attributed to startup costs at its Austin plant.

Hormel continued to concentrate on nation niches. This strategy was exemplified by the company's withdrawal from the frankfurter market, returning with specialty products like chili-stuffed Frank 'N Stuff franks and marble-ground, smoked Wranglers.

During 1985, Hormel nearly quadrupled measured network radio spending and sharply increased measured spending for network tv (up 125%), spot tv (up 122%) and outdoor advertising (up 170%). Emphasis on network broadcast, spot tv and outdoor will continue in 1986.

Although Hormel did not make any acquisitions in 1985, it contracted in July, 1985, to market meat products produced by FDL Foods, Dubuque, Ia.

The two-year pact with FDL, one of the nation's largest hog slaughterers, contains a provision allowing Hormel to buy FDL within two years. Hormel's contract with FDL was seen by most observers as ensuring hog-slaughtering capacity to replace most of its Austin plant output if 1,500 members of Local P-9 of the United Food and Commercial Workers International went on strike last August. The strategy proved correct. Union members walked out Aug. 17, 1985.

After talks stalled between Hormel and P-9 officials and the Austin plant had been closed for six months, Hormel reopened the plant in January and has hired 1,025 workers, including 500 P-9 members who crossed picket lines.

Although the P-9 strike idled Hormel's largest plant for approximately five months, the company introduced many new products in 1985-86. Hormel added Brolett & Browneit pork sausage, promoted for use in microwave ovens; Gold 'n Lite frozen breaded vegetables and cheese snacks; Chunky chili; frozen catfish fillets and bite-size Catfish Jumbers, marketed in 13 South and Midwest states; low-salt Spam; CountrySide salads, a line of four canned prepared salads; cheddar cheese, ham and pepperoni bits; canned chunk pink salmon, and Old Smokehouse Steak Sauce Plus, introduced in May, 1986, to slice into the K.R. Nabisco A1 and Heinz 57-dominated steak sauce market.

Most recently, Hormel introduced Frank 'N Stuff with a cheese core and a rolling national.

Workers at the plant may be able to vote whether they want to be represented by a union this year. Meanwhile, Hormel is negotiating with the Trustee for the UFCW international union in an effort to secure an honorable contract and put the labor dispute behind it.

IC Industries moved quickly in 1985 to merge or sell portions of its far-flung railroad operations and reallocate its corporate resources into specialty foods, consumer services and commercial products.

The sale or merger of the Illinois Central Gulf Railroad has been a top priority of IC Industries for several years.

The company has announced plans for the railroad that include divesting all but a 3,000-mile core system running from Chicago to the Gulf of Mexico.

During 1985, the company generated $486 million in cash from 11 divestitures, including a dairy unit, all retail drug and food outlets, and five ICG railroad segments totaling 1,358 miles. IC has sold 28% of its total mileage since 1968. More than half of the 9,600 miles it had in 1972 have been divested.

IC, with net income up 23% on a revenue growth of 17% in 1985, continues to show gains into 1986. Third revenues for the first six months of 1986 were $2.13 billion, up 3% over the same period in 1985. Net income in the first half of 1986 was $59.4 million, up 21%.

The ICG Railroad's 1985 revenues of $1 billion were unchanged from 1984 and accounted for only 23% of IC industries consolidated sales and revenues for the year. Sales of land segments boosted the railroad's operating income by 30% to $40 million in the first half of 1986, although revenues of $380.3 million from rail operations were off 28% from the same period in 1985.

The strategic plan at IC is to concentrate resources in specialty foods through its Pet Inc. and Pepsi-Cola General Bottlers subsidiaries, franchise consumer services through Within International and commercial products through its Pneumo Abex and Sherman Corp. subsidiaries. IC was active in each of these areas in 1985.

Although Midas was IC Industries smallest group in 1985, accounting for 7% of total revenues, the unit received $37.6 million in promotion for the seven-media unit in Leading National Advertisers, up 35.3% from 1984. Midas accounted for 54% of IC's total measured spending. Media was overwhelmingly in tv—52% spot and 47% network.

Midas set records in 1985 with a 11% jump in operating income to $40.1 million and a 4% increase in revenues to $700 million. With 1,525 muffler shops in the U.S., Midas held its 25% share of the exhaust system replacement market and boosted its share of brake and suspension system services, the company says.

Toronto-based Tenneco, marketer of Walker mufflers, controls two major chains, Can-Am and Speedy Muffler King, and ranks a distant No. 2 behind Midas. Houston-based Wiemeke Muffler Co. ranks No. 3.

Midas continues to lead the way in the market's maturation beyond mufflers into brake and suspension services.

Midas advertising, which previously offered benefits such as lower-priced mufflers and guarantees, evolved in 1985 into a service theme, "Trust the Midas Touch."

Per Inc., a division of the specialty foods group, was second to Midas in measured ad spending with a $20.4 million seven-media total, up 21%. Per had operating income in 1985 of $101 million, up 11%, on sales of $886.5 million, accounting for 20% of IC's revenues in 1985.

In February, 1986, Per terminated Grey Advertising, New York, from its growing line of frozen foods account, including Downyflake breakfast foods, Old El Paso frozen Mexican entrees, Per-Rite pie crusts and Whitman's chocolates. Creative work for these accounts was transferred to Wyse Advertising West, Beverly Hills, Cal., which handles all of Per's dry grocery items.

Ogilvy Group, Minneapolis, continues to handle media buying and planning.

New product and brand activity in the dry grocery and frozen foods categories greatly boosted spending in 1985 and through the first half of 1986, a Per spokesman says. Since fall, 1985, the grocery products group has added 25 new products and the frozen foods group has added 37.

Three varieties of Accent seasoning were introduced in 1985. Measured media for Accent totaled $6.1 million, up 112%. The spending was divided 46% spot tv and 54% network tv.

Another product category receiving significant spending was the Old El Paso line of Mexican foods. While measured spending for the Old El Paso category fell 7% in 1985 to $5.9 million, spending within the category shifted, increasing 15% to $3 million for taco sauce and shells, divided 42% network tv and 57% spot tv.

The Old El Paso brand, the No. 1 line of Mexican foods the past five years with about 29% of the $567 million dry goods market, began to unravel on the frozen foods market in fall, 1985.

In the Mexican frozen prepared foods market, Per has introduced six festive dinners, four burritos and 10 entrees under the Old El Paso brand since August, 1985. Distribution is at 51% of the U.S., and the brand has achieved 12% of the $256 million Mexican frozen prepared foods market. Selections from the 100-plus Old El Paso line also was introduced in 1985 in Europe, Australia and Japan. Per has set a goal of increasing foreign sales of the total Per division to 20% of total revenues by 1990.

Per also is facing a hot fight in the $1.3 billion Italian foods market in which it began a six-month test in June, 1986, of a 30-item line under the Italian Market banner. The line inctudes 10 dry pastas, 14 canned and bottled sauces, six menu completers such as antipasto salads and two shelf-stable custard desserts.

Competition is expected to be especially keen in the $847 million sauce market, which grew 9% in 1985. Chesebrough-Pond's Ragu spaghetti sauce holds a 30% market share, Campbell Soup's Prego line 20% and Prince 6%. Chesebrough-Pond's recently introduced two new Ragu flavors, in addition to the November, 1985, national launch of Ragu Pasta Meals, a product combining pasta and sauce in a jar that competes with American Home Products' Chef Boy-ar-dee and Campbell Soup Co.'s Franco-American canned pastas.

The higher priced Ragu product garnered 15% unit and 18% dollar shares in test markets.

The $852 million dry pasta market grew only 2% in 1985 and is made up mostly of regional brands. The category is led by Hershey Foods Corp., with a 17% share of the market for six brands. The No. 2 spot is held by CPC International's Mueller brand with a 15.4% share, and No. 3 is Borden's five brands with a combined 11.9%.

IC acquired Louisiana Seafood Packers, Carencro, La., in April, 1986, in an undisclosed price. The company makes a six-item line of frozen entrees called Cajun Cookin'. By August, 1986, the company had taken its line to distribution in 17% of the nation. Also acquired in 1985 was the E.B. Evans Co., Philadelphia, maker of ice cream toppings. Per said its Stouffer's unit and its dairy operations in 1985 in undisclosed prices.

Per also entered the second phase in 1986 of its national rollout of five varieties of Whitman's cream nuts, a frozen brand introduced in October, 1985, and began testing a line of five complete frozen breakfasts in the second quarter of 1986 under the Downyflake label.

The Pepsi-Cola General Bottlers division also had record operating income of $48.4 million in 1985, up 15%, on sales of $469 million, up 17%. Pepsi General distributes Pepsi-Cola and other products in eight states in the Midwest, a market area with a population exceeding 16 million.

During 1985, the company acquired for $77.3 million the assets of Hill Foodservice and St. Louis-based Bastian-Blessing Foodservice Equipment Co.

Both companies are broad-line suppliers of equipment to commercial and institutional kitchens. The acquisition made IC's Bastian subsidiary a major player in the foodservice equipment market.

Bastian had record operating income of $27.2 million in 1985, up 12.8%, on revenues of $287 million. The subsidiary accounts for 13% of IC's total revenues.

C.L. Pemberton, the former Premium Corp. head, was named IC president-ceo in 1985 only to resign in early August, 1986, a route his predecessor, Robert F. Schmits, also took.

Boyd F. Schenk, was named to the new post of vice-chairman.

International Business Machines Corp. is feeling the pinch from the deepest slump in the history of the computer industry and from growing pains resulting from aggressive expansion in the early 1980s.

The slump is being played out in the advertising outlays as well: spending on measured media in 1985 declined 15.7% from the previous year to $171.4 million, a fact mostly attributed to the decision to halt production and advertising of the PCjr in March, 1985. PCjr measured spending had dropped to only $5.8 million in 1985 from $32.5 million in 1984, according to seven measured media totals from Leading National Advertisers.

However, measured spending for IBM's line of personal computers increased to $34.7 million in 1985, up 15.8% from 1984. Some 64% of that spending was in network tv and 29% in magazine. Analysts predict IBM will greatly increase spending in this category by the end of 1986 or in early 1987 as new products are released.

In April, 1986, IBM launched the PC Convertible, a $2,000 portable that was the first new addition to its PC line in two years. The PC Convertible incorporates several new innovations in microprocessor chip design, trimmer housing and 3.5-in. software disks, features that could appear in the next generation of IBM desktop units.

In other key developments, John F. Akers, IBM's president since February, 1985, was elected chairman, effective June 1, 1986, on the retirement of John R. Opel. Mr. Akers retains the titles of president-ceo. Mr. Opel becomes chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors.

Mr. Akers inherits the reins of a company whose near-term prospects are mixed. Operating revenues for the second quarter of 1986 were up 7% to $12.3 billion, but net income of $1.3 billion was 8% lower than the same period in 1985 and would have been even worse except for a weaker dollar overseas.

First-quarter results showed a rise in profits of 3% to $1.02 billion, but again, profits would have fallen without the aid of a weakening dollar and an accounting change, according to IBM. Many analysts are predicting IBM's earnings will decline for all of 1986 as they did in 1985, which would give IBM its first back-to-back annual declines in earnings since 1933.

IBM's problems can be linked to the computer industry slump, a strong U.S. dollar and self-inflicted wounds, says Brian Jeffery, research director for International Technology Group, a Los Altos, Calif.-based consulting company. "But the real problem is that IBM raised everyone's expectations. IBM overcompanded while the going was good, and all the problems hit them in one crunch beginning in late 1984," Mr. Jeffery says.

Nowhere is this more evident than in the $4.5 billion market for personal computers, which is IBM's largest category of measured spending, representing 26% of the total. IBM is at a crossroads in this market as the life cycles for stand-alone products, such as the IBM-PC and the 4-year-old PC-XT, have come to an end, says Steve Cohen, analyst with the Gartner Group, Stamford, Conn. Both products are victims of lower-priced IBM compatibles now flooding the market and soon will give way to a family of networked products, such as the top of the line IBM PC-AT.

While IBM was introducing newer, more powerful models of its AT and XT computers in April, 1986, it was cutting prices 25% on all personal computers. Dealers cut $1,000 from the price of top powerful units, sold them and moved in newer, more powerful models at the same discounted price, analysts say. By June, 1986, a standard XT sold for about $2,100, compared with a similarly equipped model by Leading Edge Hardware Products selling for $1,500. A less powerful model by Tandy Corp. was selling for less than $1,000, and IBM clones by independent producers were priced in the $500 to $600 range.

"The game is boiling down to a question of price, and IBM is being edged out," Mr. Cohen says. He and several other analysts predict IBM will introduce a lower-cost version of the AT computer in late 1986 or early 1987, taking over XT's price point.

"Clearly the main thrust at IBM is toward networked products," says Frederic G. Withington, vp-information systems at Arthur D. Little, Cambridge, Mass. "Stand-alone computers are low-priced products, and IBM has made it clear that it has no real commitment to staying in a commodity-type market."

From January to June, 1986, IBM had 42.2% of unit sales and 46.9% of revenues in the market for personal computers, says JoeAnn Stabel, analyst with StormBoard Inc., Dallas. IBM's share was down from 50.7% of units and 57.4% of revenues for the same period in 1985.

Moving up was Compaq Computer, one of the chief marketers of IBM clones, with 12.7% of unit sales and 16.7% of revenues for the first six months of 1986. Compaq had 11.5% of unit sales and 12.4% of revenues over the same period in 1985. The booming market for IBM clones also has hurt Apple Computer, which had 24.7% of unit sales and 14.7% of revenues for the first six months of 1986, compared with 29.7% of units and 18.5% of revenues for the same period in 1985.

Perhaps because of pressure in this market, IBM sold its 61 IBM Product Centers in 33 states and the District of Columbia to New York-based Nynex on June 30, 1986, for an undisclosed price. IBM continues to sell through authorized dealers, but froze its dealer network in November, 1985, at 2,500 outlets. One explanation for the sale of IBM's Product Centers was that they were taking business away from IBM's direct sales force, one analyst says. A rumor is circulating that, for the same reason, IBM would like to cut off one-third of its third-party distribution network.

Despite inroads by competitors, IBM is poised for tough competition as it continues on its course of becoming the computer industry's lowest-cost producer of all computers and peripherals. IBM spent $6.1 billion in 1985 on new plant and robotic equipment and has invested similar amounts since the early 1980s, says Mr. Withington of Arthur Little. A robotic plant in Austin, Tex., now assembles the PC Convertible. A new Raleigh, N.C., robotic plant now builds color monitors for IBM computers, which until recently IBM had been purchasing fully assembled in Japan.

IBM's investment in robotics is permitting it to assert its presence in markets long dominated by Japanese companies, such as the $2 billion market for computer printers, where the Japanese controlled 80% of the 4 million low-priced units sold in the U.S. in 1985.

In the printer market, IBM is meeting the Japanese head-on with a new Charlotte, N.C., plant turning out the IBM Proprinter, a $400 model that in mid-1985 replaced a model in IBM's product line made by Seiko Epson Corp. For the month of June, 1986, IBM controlled 18% of U.S. sales of low-cost printer units, ranking third behind Epson with 30% and Apple Computer with 23%, according to StormBoard. IBM had a 5.6% market share in June 1985, compared with Epson's 25.3% and Apple's 21.7%.

IBM's measured spending on printers jumped to $8.7 million in 1985 from less than $600,000 in 1984. Measured media was divided 63% network tv, 27% magazine and 11% network radio. Printers now are IBM's fourth largest spending category, accounting for 7% of measured spending.

Likewise, IBM spent $350 million overhauling its Lexington, Ky., typewriter plant. By Oct. 1984, the redesigned plant was making electronic Selectric Typewriter 2000 typewriters, printers, keyboards and supplies. IBM's measured spending for electronic typewriters, its third largest category, increased 8% in 1985 to $14.3 million, divided 55% network tv and 45% magazine.

But even more important than IBM's move to become the lowest cost producer is the strength of IBM's installed base, both in mainframes and minicomputers, Mr. Withington says. "Even if IBM makes a mistake or falls behind, there is time to catch up. IBM owns the high ground and can hold it."

IBM has 58.3% of the $4.89 billion market in 1985 for mainframe systems and almost 30% of the $8.32 billion market for minicomputers, according to San Jose, Calif.-based Dataquest, a division of Dun & Bradstreet Corp. Corp., which agreed in May, 1986, to acquire Sperry Corp., New York, is third with 3% of the market.

But IBM has several weaknesses against these and other competitors, beginning with its fragmented product line and limited product offerings in high growth areas, such as computers designed to maximize dealing with engineering, image processing, artificial intelligence and database processing.

Compounding the problem is the threat that smaller computers will begin to absorb the functions traditionally assigned to mainframes. Although the proliferation of smaller computers increases the need for mainframes to consolidate sources of data, the users of desktop computers also need communications and networking capabilities to tap into mainframes and share resources. In this area, IBM is weak, says Mr. Jeffery of International Technology Group.

The allegation was brought about by IBM's decentralization in the 1970s. Divisions were given responsibility for their own products and launched a diverse line of products that cannot easily be interconnected. IBM is making slow progress in developing software that allows these systems to talk to one another, he says.

At the same time, some of IBM's competitors have been designing products from the ground up to be easily interconnected. An example is Digital's VAX network architecture, which permits interconnection among all of its products.

"The conventional wisdom is that IBM has some real dogs," Mr. Jeffery says. But despite criticism of machines such as the System 36, IBM has sold more than 100,000 total units, even outselling more powerful units made by IBM rivals. System 36 is reliable, user-friendly and ideal for remote locations where data processing expertise may be at a minimum, an important consideration for large corporations. The U.S. Department of Agriculture, for example, owns nearly 3,000 System 36s for its remote sites, Mr. Jeffery says.

"One company after another has come out with a better answering machine with more power. But only IBM is paying attention to what the end-user really wants," he says.

In other moves, IBM continued making inroads in the field of telecommunications through acquisition. IBM sold Satellite Business Systems (a "Wall Street-based" MCI Communications, in June, 1985, in exchange for 16.9% of MCI's stock with an option to buy up to 30%. MCI had the right to request, until 1988, up to an additional $400 million. IBM also acquired Rolm Corp. for $1.28 billion in November, 1984, later selling Rolm's Mil-Spec military computer division to Ford, 1985, to Loral Corp., New York, for $199 million.

Gerald Mayfield, president of CNFN Group, Stamford, Conn., says IBM is positioning itself to be a player in the telecommunications market, but is not overcommitting at this point.

The Rolm acquisition and partial ownership of MCI gives IBM many options.

"IBM is very serious about telecommunications, and its marketing moves clearly indicate that it wants to become a major player in this field," Mr. Mayfield says.

IBM's strategy to become a $100 billion company by the 1990s clearly indicates a pending showdown with AT&T, he says. "IBM is the ultimate strategic player."

IBM in mid-July, 1986, consolidated all its business at JWT Group agencies, involving $200 million in billings. Winners were JWT subsidiary, Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein, the current agency for IBM corporate and personal computers and related software, and J. Walter Thompson. The agency move coincided with a shift in IBM's pc marketing strategy. Cutting prices to allow most high-volume retailers to sell IBM as cheaply and profitably as the "clones", placing the primary responsibility for selling to major corporate accounts on authorized pc dealers thereby shifting up to $1.2 billion in sales of its system.

Losers were Doyle Dane Bernbach, Lieber Katz Partners, and Geer, DuBois. DDB had been the agency of record for its buying.

JWT in mid-August ousted BBDO to get Kenneth Rogers to be exec vp-group management director of the IBM business. As an exec vp-senior management rep at BBDO, he was involved in that agency's gaining the Apple Computer account from Chiat/Day this spring.

ITT Corp.'s 11.3% decrease in advertising in 1985 was largely a result of an ongoing corporate restructuring program that has included divestments of nearly half the companies it owned at the start of streamlining seven years ago. At the same time, ITT has acquired almost 40 companies.

Continental Baking Co., sold in August, 1984, to Ralston Purina Co., was responsible for much of the decrease in ad expenditures. Continental traditionally spent more than $20 million in measured media.

ITT, which does business in four primary areas, telecommunications, industrial technology, diversified services and natural resources, has shed many of the acquisitions made by Harold Geneen, current chairman-emeritus Rand Araskog's predecessor.

Much of the proceeds of these sales, which have amounted to more than $1.3 billion, have gone to reduce the company's debt.

The year-end ratio of debt to total capitalization of 34.3% is the lowest it has been since 1968.

attempts by Irwin Jacobs are among the moves by Mr. Araskog and his new president-chief operating officer Edmund Carpenter, since July, 1985, that have received favorable reaction from the stock market, a distinct change since ITT refused to dividend by 84% in July, 1984.

ITT's advertising dropped $18 million from 1984 to 1985, largely because of the sale of Continental Baking. The various U.S. media monitoring services give ITT $48 million in measured media; however, ITT says that figure should be $96 million, noting many of its more than 100 companies are highly trade oriented, making their expenditures more difficult to track.

The company must not break out advertising by medium. Therefore, Advertising Age used a total of $96 million provided by ITT as total advertising, but also used the $48 million for measured advertising. The resulting unmeasured figure contains a good deal of media advertising of small ITT units.

ITT surprised the business community in February when it announced it was ceasing marketing its highly touted System 12 in the U.S. and instead would concentrate its efforts to sell the highly sophisticated telephone switching system in Europe.

Many believed that the move signaled the company was abandoning its traditional base of telecommunications in the U.S. In early July, the company confirmed rumors about a telecommunications deal with the French. ITT and Cie. Generale d'Electricite entered into a joint venture agreement to join their telecommunications and office automation businesses. Cie. Generale d'Electricite is owned by the French government.

ITT will have a 37% share of the joint venture and receive $1.3 billion in the deal. CGE-CIT, to be sold to private investors under France's denationalization plan, is now No. 2 in Europe with $9.3 billion in sales, AT&T is No. 1. To make the deal pay, the venture must maintain market share—40% of the telephone exchange market in West Germany, 75% in Spain, 80% in Belgium, 25% in Holland, 20% Italy, 100% Norway, among others—which is largest in improving its System 12 switching equipment.

ITT's strategy will be to build on existing businesses and make minor acquisitions in areas that fit with ITT's existing businesses, particularly in the diversified services areas: insurance (Hartford), hotels (Sheraton) and ITT financial services, including consumer and commercial finance services. The latter segment is expected to be one of the most profitable groups within the diversified services segments.

Last year, ITT diversified services contributed 48.4% of total revenues, the single largest contributor, and 30% of operating income. Telecommunications accounted for 30% of total revenues and 23% of operating income.

The two largest advertisers were the Sheraton Corp., owner or franchiser of 488 hotels in 50 countries, and Hartford Insurance Group. Sheraton increased its ad expenditures by 12% to $9.1 million in measured media spending in 1985.

Hartford Insurance spent $5.6 million in measured advertising, a 22% increase, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Scott Jown cum products were supported with $2.2 million, down 21.4%.

Johnson & Johnson showed healthy gains in its pharmaceutical and professional segments in 1985, offsetting only a modest increase in its consumer segment. The consumer segment, where ad volume declined 4.3% last year, faces an even tougher 1986 than 1985 with the withdrawal of the Tylenol capsule. The withdrawal, following the second poisoning incident in four years, will cost the company an estimated $100 million to $150 million after taxes this year.

According to Leading National Advertisers, the major stuff in the media mix was an 8% decline in network tv spending, by far the dominant medium at J&J, and a 140% gain in spot tv. Magazine advertising, the company's No. 2 medium in dollar volume, was down 4%.

Measured spending for Tylenol products, J&J's most lucrative line, increased only 1.3% to $62.9 million in 1985, after a 1983-84 increase of 1.5%. Tylenol for Tylenol's caplet form, which is replacing the capsule, reached $7 million. This figure is expected to increase this year as J&J markets the caplet as "an effective and reliable alternative" to Tylenol capsules.

The company announced in February, 1986, that it would stop making capsules after the most recent Tylenol poisoning incident—the cyanide poisoning of a Westchester County, N.Y., woman.

As of July, 1986, Tylenol had almost regained its market share of 31.7%, down slightly from the 33% it had before the poisoning. The company moved quickly to pull the capsules after the incident and began an ad campaign via Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, New York, including a coupon promotion for the caplet form. J&J says its research shows the caplet "is an acceptable alternative for the majority of our former capsule users."

With the expiration of Ibuprofen patents coming this fall, McNeil Consumer Products, the J&J unit that markets Tylenol, will introduce its entry into the market, Medipren, to compete with the big two, American Home Products' Advil and Bristol-Myers' Nuprin. Other new entries include Upjohn's Motrin and American Home Products' Trendar. Ibuprofen's 1% market share in 1984 grew to 4% last year and is expected to control close to 15% by the end of 1986.

Children's Tylenol products, with measured spending down 3.4% to $11.2 million, holds an impressive 70% of the market for children's pain relievers. McNeil's Pediacare line, introduced in 1984, added Pediacare infant decongestant oral drops in 1985. Measured spending for the line was up 25% from 1984, totaling $4.3 million.

In other areas of J&J's consumer segment, Personal Products division continues to hold the lead in the external feminine protection market with a 45% share, up from 42% last year. Its product line includes Stayfree maxi and silhouette maxi pads, Sure & Natural maxi-absorbs, Carefree panty shields, and the newly named Assure & Natural breathable panty liner (formerly called Assure). The product line received $20.3 million in measured ad spending last year, a 47% decrease from 1984. Behind J&J in that market segment is P&G's Always with 25% market share, followed by Tambrand's Wisp/Slim line at a 12% share.

Johnson & Johnson Products, center in the adhesive bandage market, had a measured spending total of $12 million for Band-Aids, up 50%. J&J's new medicated Band-Aid, introduced in 1985, is the only medicated bandage available in the U.S. This year, the company launched another new addition, Band-Aid with a clear backing to make it less noticeable. Young & Rubicam, New York handles.

Measured spending for J&J's Reach toothbrush increased 22% to $6.2 million. Its ending position was flat, however, to Colgate-Palmolive's diamond-shaped Colgate Plus toothbrush, which was introduced in mid-1985. It currently holds the No. 2 position with Gillette's Oral-B toothbrush in third place.

McNeil last year began marketing Detrovex, the only over-the-counter sunburn-remedy liquid cough medicine in the U.S. McNeil invested $3.2 million in measured spending on the introduction. The account recently moved from in-house to Saatchi & Saatchi Compton, where it is expected to get a $6 million to $7 million ad expenditure this year.

The Ortho Pharmaceutical division added Advance to its home pregnancy test line, which includes First Response 2, Advance, handled by McCann-Erickson, works by a color change system and is said to be easier to use. Measured ad spending for Advance increased considerably, from $58,000 in 1984 to $3.2 million in 1985. The addition of Advance to the product line boosted J&J's market share. It competes very closely with Warner-Lambert's e.p.t., the first brand to enter the market in 1979.

J&J continues to hold the No. 1 position in the market for baby toiletries. Analysts at Charles Kline & Co., Fairfield, N.J., estimate its share at 18% at the end of 1985. Measured spending for all baby products was up 21% to $63 million. J&J Baby Products Co. added Affinity conditioner to the existing shampoo line, identifying it as allowing dry, brittle and thin hair associated with aging. It also introduced nationally Johnson's Gentle Conditioning Formula baby shampoo and Easy Combing baby conditioner targeted to older children and adults.

The company introduced Sundown sun-screen stick and sun-block stick for spot protection of sun-sensitive skin. Sundown products, which hold the top position in the sun-screen market, got $2.4 million in measured spending.

The Advanced Care Products division of Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp. began marketing Ovutime ovulation predictor test this year. The over-the-counter use provides a test procedure that enables women to predict in advance when ovulation will occur. Kalir, Philips, Ross, New York, handles.

J&J is test marketing Prevent, an anti-cavity toothpaste. Barry Curtis Spies, New York, handles. Measured spending was $1,195,800 in spot tv and magazines in a market dominated by Procter & Gamble.

Growth in the pharmaceutical segment was largely due to gaining market shares of the oral contraceptive Ortho-Novum 7/7/7, introduced in 1984. The FDA approved two new J&J drugs, Supprelin, a moderate and menstrual pain reliever, and Retin-Deconnate, a new long-acting form of antipsychotic.

Last year J&J and its Technicare and Ultramund diagnostic imaging units in General Electric Co. The company says the units were draining the profitability of its professional segment.

S.C. Johnson & Son, which fumbled most of its increase in over-all ad spending to introduce new haircare and skincare products, continued to feel the effects of a strong dollar overseas that kept corporate sales at the same level as in fiscal 1984 and 1985.

Johnson, whose emphasis has shifted over the years from flooring to personal care and over-the-counter drug products, boosted measured media spending by 48% over spending levels recorded in calendar 1984 to $80.3 million, the large difference being heavy spending for new product introductions in the company's personal care division.

In 1985, Johnson put the lion's share of its measured media spending, an estimated $20.6 million, in its continued forays into the personal care categories of haircare and skincare. This supplanting is line of Raid insecticides as the major ad magnet at the company.

In Johnson's personal care division, the largest single share of measured media spending is haircare, $10 million, went to Balsa, the company's third major entry into the $3 billion haircare category. The economy-priced line of Swedish botanical-formulated shampoos and conditioners comes in five formulas for five different hair colors, with an additional birch leaf formulation for regular, permed hair and dandruff introduced in early 1986. Each Balsa formulation contains natural ingredients to assure hair and and shine, the company says.

It will turned out to be one of the most competitive years in the haircare industry. Salsa achieved at least a 5.5% to 6.0% share of the category, although some analysts peg Salsa's share as high as 8%.

Procter & Gamble's Head & Shoulders dandruff shampoo remains category leader with an estimated 11% share.

Johnson in mid-1986 began introducing L'Ewoe by Agree Perfum shampoo and conditioner, a 16-item premium line of products that contain fragrances similar to some of the classic and most popular fragrances. Sam, similar to Charles of the Ritz Group's Opium; Lepaz, similar to Coumar's Wunderbilt; Milano, a Giorgio-like scent; Cypress, similar to Estee Lauder's White Linen, and Ember Musk, similar to traditional musk fragrances, the company says. Johnson's introduction of its fourth haircare line was delayed temporarily by a lawsuit filed by Coumar, which objected to Johnson's use of the promotional line, "inspired by Wunderbilt."

The practice of linking a new product with an established product marketed by another company has become popular in the fragrance business, where it is known as "knockoff" marketing.

Johnson claimed L'Ewoe is not a knockoff product, but Coumar charged trademark infringement and unfair competition.

In an out-of-court settlement, Johnson was allowed to link L'Ewoe Lagree to Wunderbilt, but packages must carry disclaimers disassociating the brand from any connection with existing products.

Johnson continued pushing its Agree shampoo and conditioner line to teen agers and young adults.

Agree received more than $3.8 million in measured media spending, a 31% increase. Agree's market share increased slightly to 3.5% from 3.2% in 1984.

In further attempts to reach its 12-to-25-year-old target audience, Johnson continued airing spots during NBC's "Friday Night Videos" and sponsored "Teen Age" in Atlanta with radio station WZGC.

The brand group donated at least $25,000 to area teen clubs, with the money raised through sales of the Agree line and limited edition "Agree Teen Age" t-shirts.

Curel, Johnson's therapeutic entry into the $380 million hand-and-body lotion category, was supported with more than $5 million in measured media spending, up 52% from 1985, the majority spent on network tv.

Curel's category dollar share remained in the 4.4% to 5% range, say the company.

However, the company claims that both Curel and commercially positioned Soft Sense, in terms of unit share, rank higher. Soft Sense is said to rank No. 1 and Curel has moved up to No. 2, a spot wrested from the higher-priced Keri Greenwich, Conn.-based Chesebrough-Pond's Vaseline Intensive Care, continued its status as the market leader with an estimated 19% share.

Johnson in mid-1986 moved the $4.5 million Curel account from in-house to Lintas Winard Patton Wolver, New York, the brand's first agency of record.

Soft Sense, Johnson's first hand-and-body lotion entry, has an estimated 3.8% share, an increase from 1985's 4.7% share, says a company spokesperson.

The brand received measured media spending of $1.6 million in 1985, but Johnson budgeted more than $6 million in 1986 to introduce a reformulated lotion, Soft Sense with Vitamin E. The national tv, print and coupon campaign is via J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. Ads are themed, "Suddenly, everything is softer."

Johnson in mid-1986 also entered its test of Skintastic, a moisturizing body gel.

Although the company had high hopes for the skincare product, it is unclear whether Johnson intends to distribute Skintastic nationally.

The company's Edge shaving gel continues to hold the No. 1 gel position in the men's shaving preparation category, despite stiff competition from Gillette Co.'s Foamy gel.

According to the company, Edge has a 23.5% share of the $250 million men's shaving category, compared with Foamy Gel's 2.8% share (Gillette's other shaving products elevates its overall share above that of S.C. Johnson).

Edge received $2.1 million in measured media spending, comparable with its 1984 level, although Johnson in mid-1985 introduced Edge fragrance-free as well as reformulating the entire line to contain "40% more lubricants." The company is said to be spending $3 million in media this year for the line.

Johnson also won a court victory over New York-based Carter-Wallace's Rise gel. The U.S. court of appeals ruled that Carter-Wallace willfully infringed on a patent held by Johnson and is barred from marketing Rise until late 1987.

Johnson boosted its 24-plus brands of Raid insecticides with a 25% spending increase, to $12.8 million, in magazine, newspaper, radio and tv support, or 16.3% of total measured media advertising of $78.3 million as monitored by Leading National Advertisers. However, a Johnson spokeswoman says Raid ad expenditures are underestimated by 1.3%, because "Raid brands use a great deal of local and regional spot tv which is almost always underassessed by monitoring services." Raid is Johnson's leading product line.

Measured media support for the Raid line reversed a two-year decline. Raid Flea Killer Plus, which treats the flea life cycle, received $2.6 million, equal to last year's expenditure for regular flea killer. Raid Intrusion Bagger got $2.5 million in support, a 4.2% increase. Raid 3 and Guard maintained its $1.2 million spending.

Although the Raid brand has come under increased competitive pressure from new product introductions by American Home Products' Bowe-Withway division and American Cyanamid Co.'s Shulton unit, analysts say Johnson successfully has maintained its 45% to 50% share of the $6.37 million household insecticide market.

OFF! personal insect repellent received a measured media spending boost of 12% to $2.1 million and continues to enjoy its position as leading repellent in the estimated $30 million category. Cutter insect repellent, from a division of Miles Laboratories, Elkhart, Ind., is the No. 2 brand.

Johnson's Ortho Laboratories subsidiary in 1985 began advertising seven bath products, a line it picked up from the 1984 acquisition of Cooper Laboratories, Palo Alto, Cal.

Aveeno received more than $3 million in measured media spending, spread between national tv and magazines.

Ortho also began marketing Dap continuate, part of its agreement with Lion Corp., one of Japan's largest consumer products companies. Dap, a smoker's toothpaste, was supported with more than $3.6 million in measured media spending, the majority in network tv.

The nursing subsidiary also continued promoting Fiberall laxative wafers, a line extension to the company's Fiberall sugar-free, high-fiber laxative powder.

Fiberall has maintained an estimated 11% share of the bulk laxative segment and about 3% of the total $380 million category, according to Deb Dezwyk, pharmaceutical analyst with Charles Kline & Co.

Metamucil, marketed by Procter & Gamble, is the leading laxative. Fiberall received more than $5.5 million in measured media spending.

In its home care group, Johnson's Pledge furniture was continued leading the division in measured media spending with $6.5 million, up 25.2% from 1984. Pledge commands a 23% dollar share of the $285 million dusting aids and wood polishes category (manufacturer's level), about the same as last year, according to Charles Kline & Co. However, Kline reports that Johnson's case share of the entire category is down three percentage points to 45% from 1984. Johnson's new Duster Plus, introduced in early 1985, is the company's first wax-free furniture polish.

The brand received $5.2 million in measured media spending and has achieved an estimated 5% share of the category.

Johnson's main competitor, Endust, from Bristol-Myer's Drackett Co., has an estimated 17% share, according to Charles Kline & Co. Favor, holding a 4% share, received $619,000 in measured media spending in 1985, up 17%.

Pledge and Johnson teamed up for a joint sweepstake promotion, "The winning shine," in mid-1985 in promoting Joy dishwashing liquid and lemon Pledge, respectively. This is one of the first promotions Johnson has held with another company.

Johnson discontinued marketing Glade Spinfresh air freshener bathroom tissue holder, turning its attention to new Glade Future Fresh dry aerosol air freshener and Glade Light. J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, helped introduce Glade Light in mid-1986, stressing its lower perfume levels.

Glade received more than $8.2 million in measured media spending, up 36%. Glade holds a leading 46% share in the aerosol air freshenern market worth $190 million (manufacturer's level), according to Kline.

Shout prewash laundry soil and stain remover, which continues holding a 20% share of the $139 million (manufacturer's level) category, received $3.2 million in measured media spending, up 7.2%. Shout is the No. 2 brand behind Dow Chemical's Texize division's Spray 'n Wash.

Among Johnson's fourcare products, Future liquid floor finish and Brite liquid floor finish received the most in measured media spending, about $3 million each.

Of the declining $161 million floor polishes and waxes category, Johnson continues holding a 11% share, with Johnson's Future, Clear and Glo-Coat accounting for 33% and Brite, 21% of the over-all market.

Step Saver, a one-step liquid floor wax, received only $291,700 in measured media, a 36% drop. It holds a 11% share of category.

In February, 1986, Johnson sold its Northern Laboratories subsidiary to a group of private investors headed by J.D. Cates, formerly the unit's strategic planning director. Mr. Cates is now president of Manitowoc, Wis.-based Northern.

The unit is continuing to market 3-Wax cleaning products, Capri bath and haircare products and the Continent specialty cleaning line. The estimated $3 million of assets was shifted to Keller-Crescent, Evansville, Ind., from Zorren & Wagner, Chicago.

In early January, 1986, the Johnson Wax Associates subsidiary was sold to Samuel C. Johnson, chairman and son of Johnson Wax, and to his family.

Mr. Johnson says he and his family plan to retain majority control of the acquired subsidiary, which is a holding corporation of a group of recreational and leisure time companies. It is now called Johnson Worldwide Associates.

K mart Corp. has turned its attention to tightening financial controls while expanding the profitable enterprises it already has in order to turn around a 66.7% decline in net income in 1985, a drop caused largely by a loss of $220 million from discontinued operations.

The nation's No. 2 retailer, which in fiscal 1986 has divested a Mexican joint venture retail operation and an insurance subsidiary, reported positive results in the first quarter, posting a 36% increase in net income over the year-earlier period, to $91.6 million, on sales of $5.20 billion, up 4.8%. The company reported sales up 7.2%, to $10.2 billion, for the first six months in 1986.

The company benefited in the first quarter from lower interest expenses stemming from a reduction of debt and a lower interest rate compared with 1985. Interest expense on debt was $39 million, compared with $46.5 million for the similar period the previous year.

K mart chairman Bernard Fauber predicts 1986 sales will be in the $26 billion range, but he says that passing No. 1 retailer Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago, is no longer a top priority. Nevertheless, some industry watchers predict K mart would become the nation's largest general merchandise retailer by the end of the decade.

In December, 1985, K mart's retail sales exceeded those of Sears for the first time. For the year, Sears had retail sales of $26.5.5 billion, a $4.1.3 billion edge.

K mart has been diversifying rapidly since 1984, spending $400 million to gain such specialty retailers as Waldenbooks Co., Builders Square and Pay Less Drug Stores Northwest. In addition, K mart also has home-grown Designer Depot, an off-price apparel chain begun in 1982, and two regional cafeteria chains, Furr's Cafeterias and Bishop Buffets, purchased in 1981 and 1983, respectively.

Specialty retailing provided about 11% of the company's total sales in 1985, compared with less than 5% in 1984. The specialty retailers were expected to make up 15% of the company's sales by 1990.

But K mart signaled that it would not stick with unprofitable operations when it divested itself of a Mexican joint venture and a wholly owned insurance subsidiary in January, 1986.

The Mexican venture, in which K mart had a 46% interest with Cemur S.A., a Mexican retailer, operated 11 food and general merchandise stores. K mart bought into the venture, known as Aurra, in 1981 for $30 million, and losses since then had totaled $29 million.

The other divestiture, K mart Insurance Services, had been modestly profitable over the years, except 1985. Sale of the service, which operated in 172 stores, did not affect K mart's plans to offer financial centers in at least 1,100 stores, but the company decided its relation would be as landlord.

With specialty retail stores accounting for a greater percentage of sales, they are also getting bigger shares of the capital spending and advertising budgets.

While total ad spending went up 2.3% in 1985 from the previous year, K mart owes up ad spending on the company's 2,332 general merchandise stores, including Kresge, Jupiter and K mart stores, actually declined, Mr. Feather says. 80% of K mart ad spending is handled in-house, primarily by regional newspaper media. Ross Roy Inc., Detroit, handles K mart's electronic advertising.

And while K mart plans to open 32 new general-merchandise stores during 1986, it will open 222 specialty retail operations.

Those increases include 70 units to be added to the 855-unit Waldenbooks group, 40 Pay Less Drug Stores to be added to the 183 now open, 50 stores to be added to the 30-store Builders Square chain, 10 additional units to the 160-unit Furr's and Bishop cafeteria operations, and 50 stores to the 75-unit Designer Depot operation.

Capital spending for specialty retail stores was $287 million in 1985, up from $139 million the previous year, with the increase mostly attributable to the opening of 127 units during the year.

But capital spending for K mart's general merchandise stores fell from $581 million in 1984 to $430 million in 1985. The contemporary refurbishing of 250 stores, the opening of 16 new units and the installation of a Universal Product Code system in 153 stores accounted for most of that spending. The UPC system is expected to be in all K mart general stores by 1990, at a cost of $300 million.

In its general merchandise stores, K mart continued to pursue a strategy of offering more name brands, a larger assortment of higher-price merchandise and a more contemporary presentation of its goods, aimed at attracting more upscale shoppers and at getting consumers to spend more once inside the store.

The introduction of the Jaclyn Smith fashion collection for the fall of 1985 typified K mart's direction. Ms. Smith not only was a counter to Sears' use of Cheryl Tiegs, but she also fit into the upgraded image K mart was promoting through the use of brand names and remodeling of its stores.

Launch advertising via Ross Roy was aimed at active women, with actress Smith stressing the idea that she prefers comfortable yet stylish clothing away from the set. The skirts, trousers and blouses included in the fall collection were all priced between $16.97 and $26.97.

The Smith collection originally was offered only in major markets, covering 1,400 of 2,100 stores. When K mart announced in September, 1985, that it would pump an additional $10 million into electronic media to stimulate Christmas sales, the Smith line received a significant portion of the total. The collection spurred an estimated 6% to 7% total increase in high-profit apparel sales during the first quarter of 1986.

The third line of Jaclyn Smith clothing was introduced in March, 1986, along with a new ad theme line, "K mart. Yes, K mart." Commercials via Ross Roy pictured Ms. Smith wearing the clothing in a variety of "real life styles." K mart planned to use the new theme for advertising of all fashion apparel, cosmetics and accessories, although the longtime theme line, "the saving place," was visually continued in the K mart logo. The spring line was being carried in about 1,640 stores, and all of the 2,100 stores in the string were scheduled to get the full collection.

K mart broke a new mainstream ad theme line, "America's favorite store," during ABC's 1986 Fourth of July weekend telecast of the rededication of the Statue of Liberty. Backed by a $10 million campaign, the claim was based on a survey by Simmons Market Research Bureau showing that more persons shop at K mart than at any other store.

In November, 1985, Dublin, Ohio-based Wendy's International opened one of its fast-food restaurants as a pilot in a K mart store in Canton, Mich., a Detroit suburb. Wendy's leased 1,800 sq. ft. in which it operates and staffs a restaurant that replaced a K mart-run cafeteria service. K mart and Wendy's are the demographics of their customers are nearly identical.

K mart began an aggressive expansion of its in-store consumer financial services in January, 1986. The first step was the addition of 36 stores and new services to a limited-banking program that it had operated since October, 1984, in 10 San Diego stores with First Nationwide Savings, San Francisco.

In the east, First Nationwide leased space from K mart and offered money-market certificates, certificates of deposit and individual retirement accounts. These 10, plus the 36 new stores, began offering those services plus checking accounts, automated teller machines and mortgage prequalification services. First Nationwide operated out of 136-sq.-ft. booths. K mart intends to expand banking services through First Nationwide, which is affiliated with 26 other savings and loan associations in 23 other states.

In addition, K mart continued nine other tests of different mixes of financial services with an eye toward expanding the ones that succeed. Other tests included real-estate services, full and limited-service banking, consumer loans, automatic teller machines and insurance services. K mart says it anticipates offering different services in different markets.

But K mart officials indicate they aren't planning to follow the lead of Sears in offering a general consumer credit card or even a store credit card. K mart accepts Visa and MasterCard, which account for only 10% to 12% of sales volume—compared with 70% for some department stores—because K mart has no existing sales and has a heavier mix of low-ticket items.

In June, 1986, K mart agreed to buy a $40 million telecommunications network to improve the efficiency of its marketing and credit-verification operations. The system would link the company's headquarters to its 2,100 stores, six regional offices and 10 distribution centers. Two GTE Corp. subsidiaries, GTE Spacenet, McLean, Va., and GTE Telenet, Reston, Va., will install the Skynet data network system.

In May, 1986, K mart stockholders at their annual meeting adopted staggered terms for their directors as a takeover defense.

Last year, Kellogg Co. gained two share points in the over-all cold cereal market as it increased U.S. ad spending 20.8%, and the 86-year-old food company strengthened itself against unwanted takeovers through a stock buyback.

In a move applauded by analysts, Kellogg bought 15 million shares of its stock, or 20% of its outstanding shares, from the W.K. Kellogg Foundation for $578 million. Earnings per share increased 36% to $2.28 in 1984, benefiting from the Kellogg's buyback.

Kellogg does nearly 40% of its business in cold cereals, a $4.45-billion market that grew 4% in sales and 5.4% in volume over the past year. As other cereal manufacturers—competitor General Mills in particular—have divested themselves of unprofitable non-food subsidiaries, Kellogg has reaped the benefits of its conservative stick-to-basics approach to business. The company claimed the tiger's share of category growth in 1985 with a 2% increase in volume and 1.3% increase in dollars, for a 42.4% and 41.6% market share, respectively.

General Mills also increased its over-all market share last year by fractions of a point in both dollars and volume, taking 23.7% and 20.9% of the market. General Foods lost a point in each column with a 13.3% volume share and 12.4% in dollars. Quaker Oats also lost, while Ralston Purina and Nabisco barely kept pace.

Sales for Kellogg's flagship Corn Flakes declined slightly in 1985 to an estimated $200.3 million, but the company's Frosted Flakes took the top market slot for individual brands, beating General Mills' Cheerios. Frosted Flakes brought in $256.5 million, a 5.7% share.

In measured advertising, Kellogg spent $203.2 million in eight media, up 20.7% from 1984. The company put most of its marketing thrust (and ad budget) into spot and network tv and strengthened its presence on cable tv networks.

Among its major media commitments, Kellogg increased spending on network tv to $136.6 million, up 22% from 1984. Spot tv was up 25.6% to $51.6 million, and network cable was $4.7 million, up 31.8%.

Kellogg's Just Right All Grain and Just Right Almond, Raisin & Nuts were rolled out in September, 1985, in the U.S. and reached a 0.3% annual market share. The fortified bran cereal was introduced in Australia in 1984.

In November, the company unveiled All Bran with extra fiber, a reformulated version of an high-fiber cereal. The company also continued its controversial ad campaign for the product, which links a high-fiber, low-fat diet to cancer prevention. The campaign, designed by J. Walter Thompson USA, with input from the National Cancer Institute, has been credited with boosting All Bran sales at the expense of General Mills' Fiber One and General Foods' Fruit & Fiber. It has also drawn scrutiny from the FDA and applause from the FTC.

Kellogg spent $11.5 million on All Bran tv spots in 1985. Fiber One had a $11.5 million rollout, and General Foods is estimated to have spent that much promoting two Fruit & Fiber varieties.

This summer, Kellogg introduced All-Bran Fruit & Almonds, a bran cereal with raisins, apples and almonds, adding another product to the $654 million bran cereal category. The rollout was accompanied by a $7 million network tv, print and coupon campaign targeted to adults older than 35. Other cereal entries this year included Nutri-Grain Almond-Raisin, a low-cholesterol, low-fat, low-sodium cereal partly sweetened with orange juice. C2O's was supported with $4.4 million in network and spot tv, but sales have been disappointing. Kasdan says the product may be pulled if sales don't improve.

In 1985, Kellogg launched its first entry in the $438 million-a-year granola bar market—a category that grew only 3.5% last year. Nevertheless, Kellogg's Rice Krispies Bars grabbed an average 13% share in its distribution markets and a 6% share nationally. The company spent $9.3 million on advertising for the rollout.

The category is dominated by Quaker Oats with a 50% share and General Mills with 22%. In March, Kellogg introduced a new flavor to the line, Cocoa Krispies chocolate chip. It also added a peanut butter and jelly flavor to the frosted Pop Tarts line of toaster pastries.

Kellogg continued its gradual expansion of Whitney's yogurt, and by the end of 1985, the premium-priced product was available in large Midwest and West Coast markets, as well as on the East Coast where it debuted in 1982. According to the company, Whitney's sales doubled last year. Measured spending for the product was $3.97 million in print and tv, up from $1.4 million in 1984.

The company's Mrs. Smith's Frozen Foods subsidiary claimed more than 50% of the frozen pie market last year. Early this year, the division added a new variety to the Eggo waffle line, Nutri-Grain with bran and raisins. In 1986, the company expects to expand distribution of Salada brand teas, a product of its Salada Foods subsidiary.

Kellogg spent $246 million to upgrade production facilities in Australia, Canada, Great Britain, Germany and the U.S. in 1985. Capital expenditures in 1986 are expected to exceed $350 million. The company moved into a $70 million new headquarters building in Battle Creek in June of this year.

It also began work on a $300 million plant modernization project in Battle Creek. As a result of the upgrade, the company has discontinued tours of the plant for fear of attracting industrial spies. The decision has been very unpopular with Battle Creek residents, who benefit from tourists attracted to the Kellogg's tour.

Outside the U.S., Kellogg introduced Fibre Crunch in Canada and Sweden, a flaked wheat, corn and rice cereal with fruit, in Australia; Crunchie, a preswetened Chemin[illegible] product, was launched in Mexico and Brazil, a multi-grain cereal product, was introduced in Spain; in West Germany, the company introduced Kroisant Muesli, a multigrain product, and in France Kellogg's Mini Pops and Choco Pops, two preswetened cereals, were launched. Kellogg has [illegible]% of its assets in overseas operations and collects 20% of its sales outside the U.S.

Loews Corp. said its most unprofitable business—movie theaters—and slashed spending in measured media advertising for its cigaret brands as it relied on growth and big returns to come from Lorillard, its cigaret unit, and the second most advertised division, CNA Financial Corp.

Lorillard, after dropping 4% in sales in 1984 from 1983, returned to positive growth in 1985. The cigaret division has been a steady money maker, however. Its net income increased 13.2% to $437.1 million in 1985 following a 13% increase the previous year.

Lorillard, in the seven media monitored by Leading National Advertisers, cut measured media advertising 17.8% on its cigaret brands in 1985 and saw its share of the total cigaret market decline slightly from 4.2% to 4.1%. The company credits the decline largely to the increase in sales of generic and price-value cigarets, markets in which Lorillard has no entries.

Among full-priced cigarets, Lorillard increased its market share from 4.4% to 4.8%. Lorillard contributes 22.4% of Loews' total revenue.

Newport, Lorillard's leading brand, moved into the top 10 domestic sellers of all cigarets of 1985, edging out Lorillard's former flagship brand, Kent, for the first time. Newport's market share for 1985 was 3.4%, an 11.8% increase over 1984. Newport and Philip Morris' Marlboro were the only brands to post increases among the top 10 in 1985.

Loews spent more to advertise Newport—$31.9 million for the brand line—than on any of its other brands or noncigaret products. Loews has been stressing the Newport franchise the past few years. It spent $18.9 million, for example, on the line in 1984, up 29% from 1983, according to LNA. Newport menthols were backed with about $20.7 million in measured advertising—more than half of that in outdoor advertising.

Lorillard rolled out a new brand, True Gold, in 1985, in three low-tar, nonmenthol offerings. Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, agency for the other True products, is handling the new cigarets. The company spent more than $6 million to advertise the new brand out of a total expenditure of $20 million for the True line. Spending on the line has been declining steadily the past three years. True measured media in 1985 was 10% off the 1984 level, which was 13.7% less than in 1983.

Kent spending for $14.3 million in measured media, up from $14.2 million in 1984, but still far below $23.3 million in 1983. Kent added a Golden Lights 100's package in 1985. As a result of Kent's declining sales, Lorillard underwent an agency review for the Kent family in 1985, choosing BBDO, New York, to replace Foote, Cone & Belding, New York.

Loews' financial arm, [illegible] Capital Corp., which made [illegible] of Loews' revenue and 46% [illegible] income in 1985, recorded a 41.3% increase in revenue in the property-casualty division. That increase came on the heels of a 17% rise recorded in 1984. Net income in the unit soared 219% to $229.7 million. The bill marked another all-time CNA business, however. It represented a 23% decline at its income to $461.3 million.

The company attributed its growth in the insurance business to the dramatic turnaround in the property and casualty marketplace—one beset by soaring premiums because of large settlements, the increased frequency of claims and the cost of litigation. CNA received nearly $4 million in measured media advertising in 1985, about the same as in 1984.

Bulova Watch Co. posted net income of $16.7 million, up from $3.1 million in 1984 and a loss in 1983. Bulova introduced Chime, a line of 14-karat gold and full-cut diamond watches, in 1985 and expanded its collection of other diamond watches. Bulova spent $600,000 on measured advertising last year, mostly in magazines. This represents a substantial increase over the previous two years.

Loews had an aftertax gain of $40.3 million from the sale of its motion picture theater business in July, 1985. That accounted for 13.7% of total net income. The 226-screen group with operations in six states was sold to a group headed by A. Jerrold Perenchio, producer and former co-owner of Embassy Communications.

In other developments, Loews increased its holdings in CBS Inc. from 11% to 24.9%.

HOW TO KEEP YOUR PRODUCT FROM BECOMING AN ENDANGERED SPECIES.

COME TO POPAI MARKETPLACE '86

OCTOBER 21, 22, 23—EXPO CENTER, CHICAGO.

To keep your brand from being banished to the "land of the forgotten," you need a dramatic, powerful selling force. Point-of-purchase advertising. And research proves it works. Studies show that as much as 80% of all purchases are a result of an in-store decision. So to reach your audience where they buy, you need innovative, effective point-of-purchase advertising.

At POPAI Marketplace '86, you'll see the largest assembly of successful POP programs ever gathered under one roof. And you'll also learn why hundreds of companies send their decision-makers each year to POPAI's annual tradeshow. It's the only tradeshow where you can view the most creative POP programs and speak with their creators.

In addition to personal contact with POP suppliers, you'll benefit from an intense seminar, special events and workshop program.

Among this year's highlights are:

- "The Right Marketing Mix," with Ronca Dorr, Advertising Age Editor-in-Chief.
- "Marketing to Today's Supermarket Consumer," a sneak preview of the POPAI Supermarket Consumer Buying Habits Post Study.
- "Better Marketing at the Point of Purchase," with Professor Robert Kopp of Babson College.
- "The Annual Chief Award Dinner" with featured speaker Dr. Henry Kissinger.
- Announcement of the 1986 Chief Awards.

So fill in the coupon. And get ready for POPAI Marketplace '86—the only tradeshow devoted to P.O.P.—October 21, 22, 23 at the Expo Center, Chicago. You'll come back with the tools needed to keep your products off the endangered list.

Mail this coupon, or your business card to: POPAI, 2 Executive Drive, Fort Lee, New Jersey 07024—to preregister for Marketplace '86. Mars Inc. is battling the candy wars by throwing 27% more dollars into its ad budget and rolling out new artillery, its chocolate-coated granola bar, Kudos.

The company's tactics temporarily have staved off the threat of Hershey overtaking Mars in market share in 1985, analysts say. The two candy giants are now about equal, with Mars maintaining a slim lead with a 36-37% share of the market.

For all divisions in 1985, Mars spent an estimated $276 million, up 26.9% from 1984, when Mars increased its advertising nearly 15%. While spending for candy and pet food rose dramatically, the budgets for snacks and Uncle Ben's rice products fell.

Mars Inc., headquartered in McLean, Va., is privately held and secretive about sales and operations. In April, 1986, however, the M&M/Mars division, with great fanfare, announced its first new national confection product in a decade, Kudos, available in chocolate chip, nutty fudge and peanut butter flavors. Mars' last national confection introduction was Twix in 1976.

Kudos goes up against Quaker Oats' granola bar, which has a 50% share of the $300 million category. Kudos will be available nationally by the end of the year, says Whitney Hill, M&M/Mars director of trade relations. "We think there's a lot more growth potential in the market," he says. Because Mars has more candy experience than its granola competitors, Mr. Hill says, "We think we can produce a much better product than what's on the market."

Other changes in M&M/Mars' candy lineup include new flavors for Royals, the mint confection aimed at adults; fruit cream, cherry and almond Royals were introduced in May, 1986. Mars had distributed Royals only in Washington and Baltimore for two years, but last October made them available in Atlanta. No other markets are scheduled.

Last year Mars discontinued Summit, a chocolate wafer confection. It continues to sell a ring-sized Snickers bar and a larger size M&Ms. Larger bars are highly popular, and rival Hershey recently announced it will increase the size, but not the price, of its candies.

Measured media spending according to Leading National Advertisers for major Mars candy brands includes: 3 Musketeers, $6.3 million, up 33%; Lickets cough drops, $30,000, down 90%; Mars bar, $5.3 million, up 56%; M&Ms (plain and peanut), $22.1 million, up 77%; Milky Way, $6.3 million, up 8%; Royals mint chocolates, $300,000, up 200%; Skittles, $5.4 million, up 38%; Snickers, $25.7 million, up 41%; Starburst, $5.6 million, up 14%, and Twix, $12.1 million, up 64%.

Mars' pet food division, Kal Kan, raised measured spending 28.7% to make a dent in what has been a flat category. It introduced two new products, Pedcraft dog treats, and Pedcraft Mainstreme dog biscuits. The division also is testing new sizes and flavors for its canned dog and cat foods. To appeal to owners of small dogs, the company introduced 6-oz. cans of Kal Kan dog food, which is regularly available in 14-oz.

In selected markets, a 22.4-oz. can of Kal Kan dog food in chunky beef and liver and beef flavors is being tested. Also, gourmet cat flavors—savory white fish, tender veal and chicken liver dinner—were added to the Kal Kan cat food lineup in March, 1986. In the West, a 22-oz. size of Kal Kan cat food is being tested.

Kal Kan, with 1985 sales of $140 million, down slightly from 1984, remains the No. 2 canned dog food brand behind Alpo, according to estimates by John Maxwell, an analyst for Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney, New York. Mealtime dry dog food dropped slightly in sales to $67 million and fell to seventh from fifth place, according to Mr. Maxwell.

Kal Kan canned cat food also continues to hold second place in the category, with 1985 sales estimated at $120 million, behind Heinz' 9-Lives cat food. Chow dry cat food slipped from No. 4 to No. 5, with sales of $50 million.

Measured spending for the Kal Kan division as monitored by LNA includes: Kal Kan canned dog food, $9.4 million, up 1%; Mealtime dry dog food, $8.0 million, up 14.6%; Kal Kan canned cat food, $8.4 million, up 82.8%; Chow dry cat food, $7.9 million, up 55%; Pedcraft dog treats (new), $400,000; Pedcraft Mainstreme dog biscuits (new), $10,000.

Mars' Uncle Ben's division ate last year rolled out Country Inn rice mixes, available nationally in four flavors. Country Inn must compete with a host of new rice mix products recently introduced by rivals Rovania and Thomas J. Lipton Inc. Measured spending for Uncle Ben's, however, dropped 7.7% in 1985. Uncle Ben's rice was backed by $14.6 million, down 15.6%; Country Inn (new), $1.4 million, and Uncle Ben's side dishes, $20,000, up 400%.

Mars folded its Snackmaster division one day in Mars Broker division last year, and advertising support for those products fell 10%. Combos cheese-filled pretzels are still available only in 40% of the country, while Combos cheese crackers remain in 20%. Combos may expand into a few more markets before the end of the year, but no further rollouts are planned for Curmudgeon filled snacks (available in the Southwest) and Dooley's (in the Midwest).

Measured spending for snacks includes Combos, $3.6 million, down 14.3%; Curmudgeon, $1.3 million, down 35%; Dooley filled snacks (new), $161,000; Dooley potato chips (new), $700,000.

Mars in early August, 1986, purchased Dovebar International, Chicago, maker of the superpremium-priced, chocolate-covered ice cream bars and newly introduced Dove Delight, an ice cream dessert. This is the first entry by Mars in the ice cream and frozen dessert market.

Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., the Osaka-based producer and marketer of National, Panasonic, Technics and Quasar consumer electronics brands, continues to draw heavily upon overseas markets for growth, supporting its sales efforts with increasing advertising outlays.

During 1985, a second-half downturn in its overseas markets left the company with a 7% sales growth. Nonetheless, overseas sales grew to 51% of total corporate sales, up from 48%—reflecting a 9% growth in overseas markets compared with a domestic Japan sales increase of only 3%.

Video equipment, the company's largest segment, representing 37% of total sales, advanced 8% for the year in sales, with growth coming particularly from strong VCR sales (Panasonic) in the U.S. and color TV sales to the People's Republic of China.

Audio equipment sales, representing 9% of total sales, however, dropped 9% from 1984 because of slow demand.

Matsushita, which already produces most of its electronic components, cellular mobile telephones and other products in North America, is studying U.S. production of VCRs and other products.

Matsushita is a big second-party producer, like many of the Japanese companies. Toshiba, for example, makes Polaroid's 8mm line of video cameras, and Matsushita makes Kodak's 8mm line. Matsushita also has a contract to make large screen TV sets for General Electric, which has now abandoned manufacturing them in the U.S. because of the expense.

Besides serving as a second-party manufacturer, Matsushita has grown rightly innovative. This year it has introduced a 3-in. color TV that doubles as a video camera monitor. Matsushita, however, has yet to join other Japanese consumer electronics giants, Sony and Canon, in the rush to offer the 8mm camcorder, which has a 5-10% share of the VCR market. A Matsushita line would probably cannibalize itself if it did market its own 8mm in addition to producing them for others. In Secaucus, N.J.-based Panasonic unit is one of the leaders in the VCR market.

Matsushita placed $223.1 million or 7.9% of its seven-media LNA measured spend in six magazines. Spending in that medium was up 23% from 1984. It spent $6.9 million on spot TV, down considerably from $13.8 million in 1984 when it spent $15.3 million for Panasonic Omnimovie component video systems. That same product in 1985 received only $1.9 million.

The new Panasonic Omnimovie video camera received $4 million, some $2.6 million in spot TV and $1.4 million in magazines. Panasonic color TV sets received $2.5 million, largely in spot TV, up from $2 million in 1984.

Panasonic brand spending totaled $24.7 million. Spending was actually down 7.5% from 1984.

Quasar spending totaled $15.7 million, up 28.7%. Quasar products include color TV sets, VCRs, compact disc players and microwave ovens. The other main brand in Matsushita, Technics, drew $2 million in support, largely magazines, down 26%.

Sales at Mattel Inc. began to slide in early 1986, prompting industry observers to predict a de-escalation in ad support for the leading toy company, which spent its way out of a sales depression two years ago.

Mattel's advertising and promotion dollars spent in the U.S., which have more than doubled since 1982, equaled 12% of net sales in 1985 compared with 11% a year earlier when the company launched a year-round marketing program to promote toy sales rather than save most of its promotional muscles for the fourth quarter when most toys are sold.

But Mattel "is going sideways now in an earnings sense," says vp-entertainment industry analyst Harold Vogel, Merrill Lynch, New York. Mr. Vogel anticipates Mattel will slightly outperform a somewhat sluggish toy industry in 1986—a $12 billion market.

tion, he estimated, should grow 4% to 7%.

Both sales and advertising dipped in the first six months of 1986 compared with 1985. Worldwide sales dropped to $442.4 million, down 7% from the corresponding year-earlier period. Advertising and promotion also fell 5% for the six months, to $73.5 million. Analysts see the results as a leveling off from Mattel's rapid turnaround, and sources say ad spending will be down during 1986. "They [Mattel] aren't having the year they're hoping for, but neither are the other major toy companies," one observer says.

Worldwide, in 1985 Mattel spent $180.7 million in advertising and promotion, compared with $138.9 million in 1984. "Our ad spending abroad isn't growing as fast as our sales growth there," a company spokesman says. Mattel subsidiaries in Western Europe, Canada, Mexico and the Far East contributed $140.4 million in consolidated income from continuing operations before income taxes in 1985.

The Mattel name is synonymous with toys, its sole business after an ill-advised foray into the home video market in 1983 brought Mattel near the brink of bankruptcy as it posted a loss of $394 million that year. But the toy marketer reinvented in 1984 and sold its home video division in 1987 to Tonka, Minn.

Mattel's Masters of the Universe, Princess of Power, Barbie and Rainbow Brite continue to be its stalwarts. Masters generated an estimated $250 million in worldwide sales last year. The product currently ranks second in the U.S. toy market behind Playskool, Pawtucket, R.I.-based Hasbro's Transformers.

She-Ra continues to flex its muscles in foreign markets as well, Mattel opening new markets in Spain and Argentina. Mattel has gained strength in traditional European markets, as Masters became the No. 1 toy in Germany.

Mattel also handles foreign distribution for World of Wonder's Teddy Ruxpin and Voltron male action figures. The latter, buoyed by a successful animated series, has done extremely well in the U.S.

Mattel pressed the market with new products and line extensions in 1985, a policy it vows will continue as a record-setting pace. New products generated $125 million in worldwide sales in 1985, and company sources project more than $200 million in new product sales for 1986.

We Chid, an attempt to capitalize on the success of West Hartford, Conn.-based Coleco Industries' Cabbage Patch Kid dolls, received Mattel's most concentrated ad support in 1985 —more than $10 million in spot and network tv. Large, realistic dolls continue to enjoy double-digit growth as a category.

Mattel also brought a new twist to the transformable toy market, launching a $10 million tv campaign in early 1986 for Puppies, a plush transformable animal collection. The Puppies, animal characters with detachable parts, also tapped the push-toy market.

W.U.S.C.L.E., an acronym for Wisdom of Unusual Small Creatures Lasting Everywhere, made its debut with spot tv and print support in late 1985. The line features 220 small, collectible odd creatures.

At the age of 27, Barbie also is proving remarkably resilient, as Mattel continues to update the doll with new versions such as Working Woman accessories, Day-to-Night Barbie fashions and a business-setting playset.

The 1986 incarnations of the doll include an astronaut setting, a tropical South Seas resort, rock 'n roll and two glamour motifs. Mattel has supported the product with a 10-city promotional tour, exhibiting the doll within realistic displays of each new setting.

Licensing continues to comprise a growing portion of Mattel's income, contributing $83 million in 1985, sources estimate, from $77.2 million in 1984. Masters of the Universe is second only to Hasbro's G.I. Joe in the licensing arena, with more than 40 U.S. licensees.

Animated tv series, the lifeblood of current marketing in the industry, remains under siege by parent groups charging that Saturday morning cartoons function as thinly veiled product ads. Both houses of Congress reviewed bills aimed at limiting product-related children's programing last year. Nearly all animated shows linked to products are running on network tv or in syndication. Nine of those are for Mattel products, with "She-Ra, Princess of Power" and "He-Man" the No. 1 and No. 3 most popular cartoon shows, respectively. "The editorial product is now in the hands of the toy companies," Ms. Charren says.

In addition to animated tv shows, Cannon Films, Los Angeles, is working on a live-action "He-Man and the Masters of the Universe" movie. The projected summer, 1987, release should help Masters' sales, analysts say.

Management changes at Mattel are not expected to alter the company's course, as tv president-cm Glenn A. Hastings before his resignation and subsequent death in November, 1985. Mr. Hastings was succeeded by Thomas J. Kalinske, 42, who retains his former responsibilities as president, Mattel USA.

Mr. Kalinske rose from Mattel's marketing ranks; his background includes a stint at J. Walter Thompson USA. Reports say he is being groomed to succeed chairman Arthur S. Spear, 65, when he retires.

Observers credit Mr. Hastings with the innovation of advertising year-round to turn the toy business into a 12-month operation, a move since copied by many of Mattel's competitors. In 1985, 45% of Mattel sales occurred before September, compared with 39% in 1983.

Mattel's agency situation has been somewhat turbulent in recent months. The assignment for two new lines shifted to Foote, Cone & Belding from Dailey & Associates, both Los Angeles, in early 1986, as Mattel ended a brief 13-month association with Dailey, 4A the same time, it shifted Dailey's estimated $6 million Hot Wheels assignment to Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles.

Ogilvy has picked up responsibilities for Lady Lovelylocks, a new licensed product from American Greetings Corp., subsidiary. Those Characters from Cleveland Inc. Mattel will introduce the product in October, aiming toward the Christmas season. Mattel also licenses Poppies through the Cleveland-based company.

Mazda Motors of America set record highs in worldwide sales and earnings for fiscal 1985 largely as a result of strong sales of upscale "value-added" models.

Much of the 23.1% increase in advertising at Mazda, the fourth largest Japanese auto importer in the U.S., supported the introduction of value-added models such as the Mazda 323 (replacement for the GLC), the RX-7 sports model and the gentrified compact B2000 pickup geared to an upscale, urban clientele.

The B2000 received the largest advertising outlay at $19.2 million in measured media, followed by the popular Mazda 626 ($18.5 million) and the RX-7 ($16.2 million), according to the seven media measured by Leading National Advertisers.

Sales and earnings from the parent company, Hiroshima, Japan-based Mazda Motor Corp., appearing in the accompanying box for fiscal years ending Oct. 31, were converted from yen to dollars at a rate of ¥202=$1.

Although Mazda's worldwide factory sales were down 1.8% to 1,520,167 units, the downturn occurred only in the Japanese domestic market. Ex-

McD.'s, evolving Its Views

Entrepreneur Ray Kroc opened his first McDonald's in Des Plaines, Ill., in 1955, based on a franchise agreement with Mac and Dick McDonald, who operated a San Bernardino, Cal.-area burger stun, selling 15¢ hamburgers, 10¢ fronds and 20¢ shakes. The one bilionth burger was served in prime time television in 1963, the same year the first McDonald's national ad appeared—in the Reader's Digest. The first $1 million sales for a single McD.'s was in Bloomington, Minn., in 1971. On Nov. 20, 1986, the 50 billionth burger slid off the grill in Duluth, Ga., and Dick McDonald ate it.

ports, including knockdown sets, rose 1.5% to 478,2205 units and accounted for more than 70% of total factory sales.

Mazda's U.S. sales for 1985 increased 11.5% to a record 326,557 units—210,1983 cars and 115,4664 trucks. The total gave Mazda a 2.4% share of the total U.S. market (a 1.9% share just for the autos). Mazda claimed an 8.4% share of the total import market in the U.S., down slightly from 8.7% in 1984. Over-all, its share made it the fourth largest Japanese car/truck importer in the U.S., behind Toyota at 22.4%, Nissan at 21.3% and Honda at 17.3% (cars only).

In line with plans to establish a global presence and to ensure an adequate supply of cars in the U.S., despite the voluntary restraint agreement that limits Mazda to 229,722 imported cars a year, last May the company broke ground for a new $483 million plant in Flat Rock, Mich. The voluntary restraint agreement restrictions do not include domestically produced Mazda cars or foreign or domestically produced trucks. The Flat Rock auto assembly plant, operated by the new Mazda Motor Manufacturing (USA) Corp., will have an annual production capacity of 240,1000 vehicles.

The factors opening in the fall of 1987 will make Mazda the fourth Japanese auto maker to have vehicle assembly operations in the U.S. Honda, Nissan and Toyota already have plants here. Mazda also will build a $7.1 million research and development center in Ann Arbor, Mich., due to open early in 1987. It will join Nissan and Toyota as old tenants in Ann Arbor Park.

Ford Motor Co., owner of a 25% interest in Mazda, is expected to place its nameplate on as much as 50% of the output at Flat Rock. The car to be produced will be a version of Mazda's popular front-wheel-drive 626 model.

Mazda in the U.S. is a combination of Mazda Motors of America (Central), Rancho Dominguez, Cal., and Mazda Motors of America (East), Jacksonville, Fla. The California company is a joint venture of Mazda Motors Corp. (known as Toyo Kogyo Co. Ltd. until 1984) and Sumitomo Corp. and handles car and truck imports to the Great Lakes, Gulf regions and Western U.S. The Florida operation is a subsidiary of C. Itoh Co. and handles imports to an 11-state region in the East and the Southeast.

Mazda's measured advertising expenditures in 1985 were up 29.4%, with network TV spending increasing 20% to $30.7 million, magazine spending increasing 24.3% to $222.2 million, and spot TV registering a 22% gain to $5.4 million.

Network and spot TV and continued use of auto enthusiast magazines and national newsweeklies again represented the principal media used in the introduction of Mazda's 1986 model line. The company's advertising and promotion followed the successful patterns established in recent years, with a budget heavily weighted toward national campaigns and away from regional buys on spot TV. TV and print ads continued to keep up the price/value theme of previous model years and stressed the "total performance" of the full Mazda line.

Mazda advertising for the model year, however, did have a new look. Mazda marketers are saying the company's new advertising, featuring presenter James Garner in a no-nonsense approach, is helping give Mazda its best sales year yet (in 1986). The spots first appeared in October and later in December in the National Football League playoffs.

As the campaign for the 1986 models unfolded, the creative approach disclosed a definite move to market upscale products, while sticking with Mazda's traditional price/value story. One sign of the upscale shift was the demise of the sub-compact GLC, which was replaced by the 323, a model that was called "the road car of the small cars."

Like its predecessor GLC, which got only $2.5 million in ad support in 1985, the 323 is offered in both three-door hatchback and four-door sedan versions. The standard hatchback is Mazda's price leader at $5,795, while a luxury four-door sedan is priced at $8,495.

Earlier in the model year, Mazda began marketing its new line of compact pickup trucks in much the same way as it sells cars. The strategy: Reach the wealthy, urban consumers who are now the prime targets for compact trucks. Mazda's redesigned B2000 pickup were positioned as maneuverable, fun to drive and loaded with creative comforts, but without the "Sales Alive" theme of last year. Also abandoned was the low-end truck price of $5,995 in favor of upscale B2000 models ranging in price from $6,795 to $9,395 for a LE/SE Cab Plus model. About half of the 1985 ad budget was spent on trucks.

Truck ads included four-page, preprinted, full-color inserts and spreads in general interest and enthusiast magazines. The enthusiast magazines also carried a 12-page insert promoting the full passenger car line, exclusive of trucks.

Full promotions included the "weekend" use of network TV with the message aimed at men with incomes of more than $35,000. Sponsorship was heavily weighted with sports programming, highly rated weekend shows such as "60 Minutes," weekend movies and prime-time programs on Fridays. Mazda also expanded its sponsorship of NFL football, NCAA basketball and other events.

The "Mazda Sportsmost" series of sports journalism programs on cable's ESPN continued for a sixth year with Mazda sponsorship, along with the new "Monday Night Match-Up," also on ESPN, which profiles the two teams matched in the Monday night football game on ABC-TV. Mazda reportedly will not renew sponsorship of "Match-Up" again this fall.

Mazda also continued sponsorship of women's professional and senior professional golfing events.

Mazda continued its involvement in auto racing with its RX-7, high-performance rotary engine sports passenger car winning an unprecedented sixth consecutive GTU championship of the International Motor Sports Assn. Sales of the RX-7 for 1985, stimulated by $16.2 million in measured media costs, reached 53,831 units, up slightly from the previous year. The completely redesigned 1986 models are priced at $13,595 for the two-seater coupe and up to $20,295 for the turbo coupe, with 1986 sales projected at the rate of 5,500 units per month.

The 626 model, with sales of 82,936 in 1985 and up 22% from the previous year, continued to be the company's best-selling car for the third straight year. The 626 was priced between $9,480 for the two-door sedan and $13,595 for the four-door GT Turbo touring sedan.

Increased ad spending at MCA Inc., parent of Universal Studios, can be attributed to MCA's mid-1985 acquisition of LIN Tivo, which spent $4.1 million in measured media. Only Spencer Gifts and Yosemite Resorts spent less on measured advertising in 1985 than in 1984; most of MCA's divisions doubled or tripled measured media expenditures.

Filmed entertainment accounted for 57% of the company's total sales, up from 53.8% in 1984. The segment's operating income of $345.7 million was up from $61.3 million in 1984 and represented 67.7% of the company's total operating income of $215.1 million.

Most of the segment's improved performance is attributable to the box office success of "Back to the Future," which recorded gross revenues of $105 million in 1985, and the release of "E.T., the Extra-Terrestrial," and moderate theatrical hits such as "Fetch," "Mask" and "Brewster's Millions." As videocassettes, "Back to the Future" and "Mask" sold more than 150,000 units through mid-1986.

TV syndication sales of "Climbe A Break" and "Western Movies" generated more than $100 million in income. Only sales for the division's merchandising arm declined because few movies or TV shows produced by MCA in 1985 spawned popular retail items. Other units such as MCA Home Video, pay TV, the studio tour and amphitheater improved sales in 1985.

The company momentum also has spilled over into 1986. MCA posted record first-half revenues of $1.186 billion, up 22.8%, and net income of $59 million, up 42% over the corresponding period in 1985.

At the same time, MCA stock stabilized by the end of the year after it jumped in early 1985 amid rumors of a merger with RCA and a 3-for-2 split in August. "MCA has its speculative appeal, but I'm still favorably inclined toward the company," says Eugene Perron, director-technical research, Bateman Eichler, Los Angeles. "MCA's assets and talent suggest a strong future even though the company has lost its progressive edge. It tends to follow rather than be on the cutting edge of a trend."

Harold Vogel, vp, Merrill Lynch Capital Markets, New York, agreed. "MCA may not be as dynamic as other entertainment companies, but it will have dependable earnings the next few years on the strength of its syndication sales. It spends and generates a lot of income. MCA is the big industrial company of the entertainment business."

MCA's biggest question mark for 1986, however, is the continued lagging performance of Universal Pictures in a movie industry in which revenues on the whole declined 7% to $3.75 billion in 1985. Universal currently ranks third in 1986 box office market share behind Paramount Pictures and Warner Bros. largely because of "Out of Africa," which has grossed $86 million as of mid-1986, "Legal Eagles," which has grossed more than $46 million so far, and "Money Pit," $36 million, are other successes.

During 1985, "Back to the Future," produced by Stephen Spielberg's Amblin' Entertainment, grossed more than $150 million at the box office to help the movie division sales almost reach the revenue levels of 1983 when Universal released "E.T.," a $350 million blockbuster.

Universal Pictures released only 14 films last year compared with 18 in 1984, but earned more money and spent more money on advertising. In 1984, most new releases received $2 million to $3 million in measured backing. In 1985, most received between $2.5 million and $5 million.

The escalated spending on films primarily comes from increased cable TV and spot radio buys intended to reach the teen market.

Network TV, however, continued to be the major national media used for movie marketing. Frank Price, chairman, MCA motion pictures, and Warren Adamowsky, exec vp-advertising/publicity/promotion, have large network TV campaigns and instituted the new media policy when they joined Universal from Columbia Pictures in November, 1983. In 1984, network TV accounted for more than 40% of the division's TV advertising and declined slightly to 35% of the $40 million spent for TV in 1985. Cable and spot TV accounted for 8% and 7% of the spending, respectively.

The increased spot radio buys by the movie division also helped quadruple the company's previous spot radio spending. In 1985, MCA's spot radio expenditures totaled $1 million, 400% more than 1984's $1.5 million.

Ad spending by MCA Home Video also quadrupled in 1985 to $272,000 and is expected to reach the $1 million level this year as the $4 billion-a-year videocassette industry continues to grow. Home video has become an important revenue source for the studio. Ranked seventh among home video companies, MCA Home Video wholesale volume surpassed $130 million in 1985. For example, box office busts like "Stick," "Into The Night" and "Cocoon" each earned more in retail videocassette sales than at the box office.

While both the movie and home video divisions add to profits and record revenues, TV syndication is filmed entertainment's bread-and-butter business.

A Tale of Two Cities

In either the best or worst of economic times, it doesn't make sense to buy newspapers that don't effectively reach the whole Seattle-Tacoma DMA®. Though Tacoma is but a mere 35 miles south of Seattle, it is a market largely unreached by Seattle newspapers.

If you want to reach the entire metro area, add The Tacoma News Tribune to your advertising schedule. You'll reach 236,400 adults every day.

Reach the Tacoma portion of the market with a Tacoma newspaper. In terms of gaining results, it would be a lot better than a tale.

ness. Licensing agreements signed in 1985 for tv shows to be syndicated later will yield at least $490 million in subsequent years. This fall, "Magnum P.I." will generate at least $200 million in fees while "The A-Team" and "Simon & Simon" will bring in a combined $250 million in 1987.

These figures normally would paint a bright picture for any tv division, but MCA Television's strength is one-hour dramas, which may never again command the $1.8 million per episode "Magnum, P.I." will earn in syndication. MCA Television, the same as other producers, spends more to produce a dramatic or action show than it receives from the network. One hit often pays for the deficit and any flops, but the marketplace is changing. Independent stations today are buying half-hour shows or first-run situation comedies with the one-hour series no longer commanding a high price.

MCA learned this first-hand when episodes of "Knight Rider" failed to sell as expected earlier in 1986. Now MCA is recutting the hour show into half hours to make it more attractive to stations. MCA also turned down a 14-episode commitment from NBC for "The Ultimate Adventure Company" because of the hour show's high cost and dismal syndication potential.

The tv division now is concentrating on comedy development and signed a five-year deal with Arthur Co. to create comedies; signed a distribution deal with Embassy Entertainment Group giving MCA rights to sell "Gimme a Break," "Late and Alie" and future projects, and committed to produce 74 episodes of "The New Leave it to Beaver" for Turner Broadcasting System's WTBS.

"Making television programming at the prices the networks have been paying is not as good a business as it used to be," Universal tv president Robert Harris admitted earlier this year. As a result, MCA also recently created MCA TV Enterprises Division to expand the company's first-run syndication production, a business that has made millions for New York-based King World and Culver City, Calif.-based Lorimar-Telepictures. Shelly Schwalb, exec vp-sales, marketing, barter activities, moves to the West Coast from New York in September to head the new division.

The pending $307 million purchase of WOR-TV, New York, one of the nation's four o-o-o stations, also strengthens MCA's future in tv because it guarantees an outlet for MCA Television product in New York. Many observers called MCA's bid excessive because it costs roughly 21 times the station's cash flow, but the company was willing to pay a premium to guarantee its entry in tv station ownership. Most stations sell for 10 to 17 times cash flow.

MCA continues to diversify in other areas. In January, 1986, MCA acquired 33% of Cineplex Odeon Corp., Toronto, North America's biggest theater chain with 1,017 screens in 395 locations. Then in May, MCA exercised its option to increase its stake to 50%.

Of the major studios, only MCA, 20th Century-Fox and Warner Communications signed the 1948 consent decree, which divorced distribution from exhibition and prohibited the three companies from getting back into exhibition. Paramount was not barred. Columbia, MCA, Orion and Tri-Star did not own theaters at the time of the Consent Decree and each hopes to expand in exhibition.

MCA's plan includes construction of a 12-screen, 5,600-seat complex as part of the studio's 420-acre lot in Universal City to open in June, 1987. MCA Development completed the Universal City Plaza office complex in April, 1985, with Texaco as the major tenant. Next the company plans to build a multilevel parking structure on the lot and expects to obtain governmental approval of a Universal City on/off ramp connecting to the Hollywood Freeway.

In February, 1986, the company completed an agreement with the China Film Corp. for distribution of motion pictures in China. In mid-1985, MCA also acquired LJN Toys, a fast-growing company that develops and markets licensed toy products for E.T., The Extra-Terrestrial; Dungeons & Dragons; Jennie Sheets, and Michael Jackson. In just five years, LJN has become one of the 20 largest toy companies in the country with its battery-operated vehicles, action figures and fashion dolls.

While the company started slowly in 1985, LJN produced record revenues of $77 million in 1985 because of consumer demand for its three new toy lines: Voltron, Thundercats and World Wrestling Federation characters.

In May, 1986, MCA acquired all the stock in Front Line Management, a personal management company for rock stars; Full Moon Records, and Facilities Merchandising, which produces novelty items for 22 annual tie-ins/worldwide. The purchases strengthened MCA's ties with MCA Records president Irving Azoff, who partly owned the three companies.

Under the direction of Mr. Azoff, MCA Records has made a remarkable turnaround. After losses in 1985 of $7.9 million, the division earned $6.1 million in 1986 and $25.6 million in 1985 on record revenues of $307.7 million, up 21.3%. Albums by Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers, Night Ranger, Glenn Frey and Olivia Newton-John were certified platinum in 1985 (sales in excess of 1 million units). Sound tracks for MCA films and country music continued strong performances. And in black music, long an MCA Records weakness, New Edition earned a platinum album while Patti LaBelle, Jimmy Womack, Lionel Ends, The Jets and Colonel Abrams all recorded top 10 hits.

The retail and mail order segment recorded MCA's only disappointing 1985 returns with revenues of $296 million, 5% less than 1984, and operating income of $1.02 million down from $6.6 million. Slower sales the first nine months of the year and a special provision for closing its foreign mail order operations contributed to the off year. But an improved fourth quarter is expected to lead to a profitable 1986.

Nothing seems to slow McDonald's Corp.'s growth. Despite slumping fast food industry sales, repeated attacks from competitors and pronouncements from industry watchers that the restaurant market is saturated and cannot continue to grow, McDonald's continues to grow. It remains the world's largest hamburger operation by adding stores, adding menu items and adding to its already formidable marketing war chest.

In 1985, the McDonald's system (both the company and its franchisees and joint-venture partners) spent $660 million worldwide on advertising and promotion. An estimated $550 million, or 83% of that total, was spent in the U.S.

The 1985 ad spending total of 6.2% of sales represented the first increase in advertising as a percentage of sales since 1982, when systemwide ad spending was 6.7% of sales. It dipped to 6.1% in 1983 and 6% in 1984.

Fueling that increase in the ad spending ratio was a nearly 20% jump in U.S. measured media advertising. Network tv spending increased 13.8% to $184.9 million, while spot tv spending rose nearly 29% to $117.9 million. The rise in local tv spending reflects McDonald's accelerated rate of new product testing in 1985. Both Big Mac, a sandwich of "mutilated hamburgers were added to the system on a market-by-market basis throughout the year—heavily supported by local tv advertising—before gaining national advertising.

The largest single increase last year in media spending came in network cable. In 1985, McDonald's spent $1.6 million on cable advertising, up from $82,000 the previous year.

The restaurant and fast food industry in 1985 for the first time spent more than $1 billion on tv advertising. Of the $2.38 billion total for spot and network tv, McDonald's accounted for 21%. Runnerup Burger King spent $335 million on tv advertising, or slightly better than half McDonald's bill. In fact, McDonald's 1985 tv advertising expenditures were only slightly less than the combined tv spending of No. 2 chain Burger King, No. 3 Wendy's International ($83.7 million) and No. 4 Kentucky Fried Chicken ($75.3 million). That kind of marketing dominance has helped McDonald's maintain its better than 19% share of the estimated $45 billion U.S. fast food industry.

McDonald's foreign presence also is growing. In 1985 its number of stores outside the U.S. rose nearly 13% to 1,920, compared with 1,709 at the end of 1984. The chain last year opened its first restaurants in Bermuda, Italy, Luxembourg, Mexico, Thailand and Venezuela, bringing to 40 the number of countries in which the chain is represented. The first two McDonald's in Argentina are expected to open in September, 1986.

As part of the agreement signed in 1984 with the U.S. Navy, McDonald's has begun opening restaurants on naval bases in the U.S. and overseas. The first overseas naval units to get on-base McDonald's last year were in Japan, Bermuda and Puerto Rico.

Other "nontraditional site" McDonald's continue to be opened in the U.S. in colleges, hospitals, train stations and such public areas as zoos. Such sites accounted for 9.3% of all U.S. locations by the end of 1985, up from 8.3% at the end of the previous year. "There is not a corner we will not explore," the company pledges in its 1985 annual report.

The greatest change in McDonald's marketing strategy in the past 18 months has been its new-found aggressiveness in new product introductions. During most of its 30-year history, McDonald's Corp. had been very conservative when tinkering with its menu, introducing significant new products systemwide at the rate of about one every few years. The Filet O'Fish arrived in 1965, the Big Mac in 1968, the Quarter Pounder in 1972, the Egg McMuffin in 1973, Chicken McNuggets in 1980. Some menu items rolled out to more than half the system were disappointing and pulled before they achieved systemwide introduction. Among those were the Chopped Beefhead sandwich introduced in 1978, the McChicken sandwich in 1979 and the McRib sandwich in 1981.

But since the beginning of 1985, McDonald's appears to have overcome its fear of failure and has introduced to in-store tests a record number of items. Products that received limited testing last year included the ¼-lb. Cheddar Melt hamburger sandwich; Chicken McSwirls, a cheese-topped concentration of the failed McChicken; Veggie McCrispy, deep-fried French toast sticks, and the Lite Mac, a lower-calorie version of the Big Mac. Test results for these products appear to have been unimpressive, since the trials were either terminated or not expanded.

The jury still is out on McPizza, a hand-held, single-serving pizza product initially tested in the Philadelphia region last fall.

Three items are the systemwide successes: McD.L.T. breakfast biscuits, packaged salads and Shanghai McNuggets.

Originally tested in Shreveport, La., and Cleveland under the name Lettuce & Tomato Special, the McD.L.T. is sold in a two-sided container meant, in advertising for the product concept, "to keep the hot side hot and the cold side cold." The McD.L.T. was in all U.S. units by November, 1985, and McDonald's backed its introduction with advertising spending unprecedented in the industry. Sources estimate the chain spent $100 million on advertising and promotions for the sandwich. A fried version of the sandwich—the Chicken L.T.—continues to be tested.

Finally behind breakfast biscuits were added to all stores in the spring of 1986, as McDonald's finally devoted its marketing budget to something other than McD.L.T. Addition of breakfast-in-store biscuits was significant not only because it bolstered the chain's breakfast items (which accounts for roughly 20% of per-store sales), but also because it meant the addition of ovens to McDonald's stores. These ovens, McDonald's executives privately could be used in the future to prepare other items, such as baked potatoes or Danish pastries.

While other fast food chains scurried to meet consumer demand for lighter foods by adding in-store salad bars, McDonald's resisted, saying salad bars were labor-intensive, unattractive and, worst of all, unprofitable. Competitors such as Wendy's have made salads an important part of their menus; others, like Burger King, encountered the problems McDonald's feared and de-emphasized the product.

Slowly, McDonald's has added packaged salads to its system, beginning with urban locations. The product should be in the majority of U.S. stores by the end of 1986. The advantage of selling only packaged salads, McDonald's maintains, is that they can be sold at drive-through windows where better than 40% of per-store sales are made.

Shanghai McNuggets are McDonald's nod to the rising popularity of Oriental restaurants. Tested in the spring of 1986 in the Pacific Northwest, the item couples regular Chicken McNuggets with one of four Oriental dipping sauces, chopsticks and a fortune cookie. The product was expected to be introduced systemwide by September—if McDonald's could find the 3 million drumsticks and fortune cookies it needed.

In addition to recovering its bearings from abort testing new products, McDonald's also has abandoned its past reluctance to use celebrities in its advertising. In 1985, the company signed an Olympic gymnast Mary Lou Retton, who appeared in tv commercials and a McDonald's-sponsored tv program called "Fourth" airing on Saturday mornings.

McDonald's also was the first major advertiser to use the Chicago Bears' 300-lb.-plus defensive tackle and occasional running back William "The Refrigerator" Perry. A network tv spot featuring Mr. Perry and several other members of the Bears broke in December and aired through the team's lopsided victory in the Super Bowl.

Other celebrity appearances were made by soul singers Jerry "Iceman" Butler and Aretha Franklin for the McD.L.T. (in a spot from which consumer agency Burrell Advertising's cartoon character Pepe LaPew for McD.L.T. (surely the only time a skunk has been used to sell a food product), and country singer Roger Miller, rock group Gladys Knight and the Pips and the Chicago Lyric Opera in a joint pitch for the Big Mac, Quarter Pounder and McD.L.T. Opera star Luciano Pavarotti was approached to represent the McD.L.T. but turned the offer.

In mid-1986, sports broadcaster and former NFL coach John Madden joined McDonald's increasingly star-studded ranks. He is featured in a television campaign promoting service speed and featured "You get it fast, you get it fast."

Two very special people featured in McDonald's advertising were Josh Ann Bull and Andrew Rubin. The two deaf students appear in "Silent Persuasion," believed to be the first network tv commercial in which only sign language is used. The spot broke May 15, 1986.

Perspectives from an AAA director

Education keeps organization strong

Douglas T. McClure, director of advertising and marketing strategy at Ford Motor Co., says that government watchdog activities and ongoing educational programs are his key concerns at the Assn. of National Advertisers.

"I think what the ANA is doing now is in the right direction. We have a strong staff in legislative action and regulatory action. Advertisers are interfacing with the Four A's and the AAF [American Advertising Federation] where required," says Mr. McClure, who serves on the ANA's executive committee, membership eligibility committee and the advertising management standing committee.

Mr. McClure is also chair of the bylaws committee and a director of the Ad Council. The cum laude graduate of Princeton University says that continuing education also is a strength of the ANA.

"Seminars and workshops are very important in the training of our supervisory managers and hourly[illegible]," he says.

Mr. McClure is a 28-year veteran at Ford Motor Company, where he began as a sales trainee in the Lincoln-Mercury Division.

Following several sales and administrative assignments, he was named sales manager for the former Continental Division and served as Ford Division's Dealer-Interest coordinator in the car promotion and planning department. He was appointed car sales promotion manager in 1981. Previous assignments with the Ford Division include manager of car merchandising, merchandising manager and ad manager.

Despite a continuing oil glut which might tighten soon with OPEC's announcement of production quotas, and a continuing slide in the financial performance of its retail subsidiary, Montgomery Ward, Mobil Corp. managed to keep its sales on even keel in 1985, compared to 1984.

The nation's third largest corporation and second largest oil company reported net income of $1.97 billion, up 34% from $1.47 billion, although when adjusted for changes in pricing (for crude oil, products, materials, operating expenses) net income dropped to $956 million. Some analysts still regard this performance as strong, because the company kept sales steady while its gasoline prices plunged.

Mobil supported its various enterprises with an estimated $195.3 million outlay for ad costs in the U.S. this year, a jump of 11% from 1984.

Mobil spent the most advertising, according to Leading National Advertisers, to prop up its struggling Montgomery Ward retail business, a business Mobil has said it wants to sell. The corporation spent $9.3 million on Montgomery Ward, down 16.2% from a year earlier. Its other big ticket items included $7.4 million on Hefty plastic tall kitchen and trash bags, down 38%; $7.5 million on Petro gasoline, up 50%; $6.6 million on Mobil 1 motor oil, up 65%; and $2.7 million on general corporate promotion, down 13%. Advertising Age estimates Mobil spends twice its 11-media measured advertising figure of $61.5 million in unmeasured media.

Montgomery Ward's sales were down 7% in 1985 as it concentrated its effort on smaller specialty stores, ones that carry limited lines of goods in greater depth. Montgomery Ward also closed many smaller and mid-sized stores; abandoned its catalog operation after 113 years, and remodeled some of its other department stores. While Mobil says it might sell Wards, no date has been set.

Mobil recorded a drop in earnings in its retail merchandise operation (which also includes Jefferson Ward discount stores) of 21%, from $53 million to $42 million. Montgomery Ward is down to 315 stores from 366 at the end of 1984.

Montgomery Ward, however, is far from giving up the ghost. The retailer bought 52% of Clayton Bank & Trust, Clayton, Del., and plans to sell its commercial business making it a sort of nonbank. This is the same route Sears, Roebuck & Co. took to gain a base from which to issue its nationwide Discover credit and financial services card. Sear's "springboard" bank is Greenwood Trust Co., also in Delaware.

Mobil put up for sale its chain of Jefferson Ward stores, selling stores in five states and liquidating the merchandise in the remaining outlets. Mobil spent about $2 million advertising Jefferson Ward stores in 1985, up from $1.4 million in 1984. It recorded a $508 million restructuring provision (after tax, consolidated) covering the sale of those stores.

Mobil also sold Container Corp. of America, Chicago, its paperboard division, to an Irish company named Jefferson Smurfit. The price: $700 million and assumption of a $457 million debt.

In the summer, First Interstate Bank of Washington announced an agreement with Mobil for its point-of-sale network in the state to be part of an electronic banking system called Accel. Holders of bank cards in the Accel-member banks can use their cards to buy gasoline and other products at a discount.

But the summer brought little warmth to the storied relationship between Mobil and The Wall Street Journal. The rift between the two dates back to November, 1984, when the Journal reported a link between then-Mobil chairman Rawleigh Warner and a development project by a company for which his son-in-law worked. The Journal suggested that relatives of company executives may have been given business from Mobil because of their relationship. Mobil refuses to send press releases to the Journal, declines to talk with its reporters and abstains from advertising in the paper.

Anyway, it is to some extent academic. Mobil still sends its releases to the Dow Jones ticker and the Journal says it is able to cover the company. "Our reporters have very good contacts," says Lawrence Armour, WSJ corporate relations director. "We are covering Mobil in good fashion with or without their support."

Mr. Armour has suggested that companies like Mobil want the Journal to be "cheerleaders" for American business.

Mobil polishes its image through the sponsorship of Public Broadcasting shows, "Masterpiece Theatre" among them. Mobil's former subsidiary, Container Corp., in 1985 donated 311 pieces of commissioned artwork to the Smithsonian Institution in Washington. The collection illustrated the company's 33-year-long "Great Ideas of Western Man" advertising series, one of the longest running corporate image campaigns ever.

Among new products in 1985, Mobil introduced Delzac-1, its cleaner oil for diesel engines. It also introduced a higher viscosity Mobil 1 oil, its brand of oil that has been on the market in one form or another for 10 years. It introduced an advance formula super unleaded gasoline that it claims cleans the engine as it works, and solves the problem of fuel injector clogging in new cars.

Mobil's second quarter performance suggests more growth, and analysts suggest higher prices and thus higher profits with an OPEC quota. The company reported earnings in the second quarter of $582 million, a dramatic 42% gain.

Yet total sales are reported by Mobil to be down, from $14.3 billion in the second quarter of 1985 to $12.2 billion this year, a drop of a precipitous 15%. First half sales also are reported off by Monsanto Co. exhibited its corporate mission in 1985 by moving boldly into the pharmaceutical field with the acquisition of G.D. Searle & Co. and escaping through divestiture dependence on the highly cyclical commodity-type chemicals, plastics and man-made fibers business.

The acquisition of Skokie, Ill.-based Searle, which was tendered July 22, 1985, and the corporate restructure, which took place in the fourth quarter, were costly, and came at a time when corporate financial returns were sagging. Monsanto's net sales for 1985 increased less than 1% and operating income fell 48% to $351 million in 1985. The costs associated with the restructure led to a net loss for the year of $92 million, compared with a profit of $439 million in 1984. Sales for the first six months of 1986 were up 11% to $3.2 billion, and net income increased 26% to $266 million, compared with the same period in 1984.

Analysts say the Searle acquisition, which cost $2.8 billion, is a good fit, complementing Monsanto's strengths in research and shoring up its weaknesses in marketing and product development. A report by Prudential-Bache speaks of Monsanto as the "high-technology chemical company of the 1990s," given its new direction.

Searle's strong presence in the pharmaceutical market will help Monsanto introduce a new drug called Cytotec to treat ulcers if approval comes from the FDA. The drug has been approved in 14 countries. Searle also is developing products to treat high blood pressure and problems associated with heart ailments, among other projects.

Despite heavy borrowing to purchase Searle, the report noted that Monsanto had liquidated assets to finance the purchase, generating about $1.6 billion, with about $1 billion from the sale of Monsanto's North Sea and Gulf Coast oil and natural gas reserves, and the sale of petrochemical plants in the U.S. and U.K.

Monsanto also finalized the sale in August, 1986, of a Texas City, Tex., plastics plant for $160 million to Sterling Chemical, Houston, and in mid-1986 put up for sale its container business group, which makes plastic bottles for shampoos, food products and cosmetics, among other items.

In November, 1985, Monsanto sold Searle's consumer products group to Procter & Gamble for $330 million. The sale eliminated Searle's line of consumer products, including Icy Hot, Dramamine motion sickness tablets and Metamucil laxatives, which combined, accounted for $6.7 million in Searle's measured spending for 1985.

On Jan. 1, 1986, Searle's NutraSweet brand was made into a free-standing subsidiary, charged with sales and marketing of NutraSweet and Equal tabletop sweetener. NutraSweet in 1985 accounted for $28.3 million in measured media spending, up 20% from 1984, and represented 45% of the combined 11-media spending total for the two companies.

Spending was divided 93% network tv, 4% magazine and 3% spot tv. Second on the spending list was Equal with $9.7 million in measured media for 1985, up 20%, and accounting for 15% of the 11-media total. Spending was divided 71% network tv, 26% network radio and 3% magazine.

Since NutraSweet's approval by the FDA in 1981, total sales of the product had grown to more than $700 million by yearend 1985, including the period before Searle's acquisition. The product has had a significant impact on category sales of artificially sweetened products.

For example, the powdered soft drinks category has grown in less than three years from $650 million in annual sales to more than $900 million in 1985, according to Searle estimates. Since the introduction of Equal in 1982, the tabletop sweetener market has grown from $100 million to more than $250 million with Equal holding more than a 50% market share.

The most dramatic growth has occurred in diet soft drinks, where sugar-free brands are growing at an 11% rate compared with a 2% growth rate for sugar-sweetened drinks. In 1985, sugar-free soft drinks accounted for about 25% of grocery store soft drink sales in the U.S. More than 45 sugar-free brands, including all major brands, are sweetened with NutraSweet.

Monsanto recorded a big drop in spending for carpet fibers in 1985, with measured media falling 60% to $1.9 million. The most significant drop was for magazine spending, which fell to less than $1 million in 1985, compared with $3.9 million in magazines the previous year.

Spot tv for Lasso herbicide received more measured spending in 1985, jumping 20% to $2.3 million. Measured spot tv for Roundup herbicide fell 33% in 1985 to $1.5 million. Monsanto once again was the nation's largest farm publication advertiser in 1985 with $7.2 million in measured media, mostly for Lasso and Roundup, down 19%. Monsanto's U.S. patents covering Lasso expire in December, 1987, while U.S. patents covering Roundup expire in 1991 and 2000.

Earle H. Harbison Jr., who headed the transition team after the Searle acquisition, was named Monsanto president-chief operating officer in May, 1986. He succeeds the late Francis J. Fitzgerald. Mr. Fitzgerald had assumed the presidency April 1, 1986. Mr. Harbison was chairman of both NutraSweet Co. and G.D. Searle & Co., posts he resigned on taking the Monsanto position. Sheldon Gilgore, president-ceo of Searle, and Robert Shapiro, president-ceo of NutraSweet, were named chairmen of their respective divisions, in addition to their other posts.

Nestle Enterprises spent much of 1985 absorbing its acquisitions of the previous year, Carnation Co., Hills Bros., MJB Co. and Hills Bros.' own acquisition, Chase & Sanborn. Part of the digesting period included major cuts, some at top levels, in the corporate staff of Carnation, reportedly dictated by the parent company in Switzerland.

Nestle Enterprises' U.S. base is in Solon, O., where it runs its Stouffers Foods Corp., Stouffer Hotels and restaurants. Nestle Foods, White Plains, N.Y., is headquarters for its chocolate, coffee and tea operations. Carnation Co., Los Angeles, reports directly to parent Nestle SA in Vevey, Switzerland. Libby, McNeill & Libby operations are split between Nestle and Carnation.

Carnation reduced its over-all food products ad spending in 1985 by 20%, according to Leading National Advertisers' published measured media ad spending estimates. Spending reductions came from withdrawing support from Slender, on which it had spent $45,500 in 1984; Carnation tuna, which had been supported by $47,900; Carnation ice cream, which received $17,600 in 1984, and Carnation Health & Nutrition Centers, which the company closed in the spring of 1985 and on which it had spent $44,700 in 1984. Also, several nonrelated companies were spun off from Carnation after Nestle took over.

The winners for increased ad backing for Carnation were Bon Bons, chocolate-covered vanilla ice cream balls, introduced in parts of the country in March, 1985, which received $2.1 million in measured media, up from $476,900 in 1984.

Carnation spent $20.7 million on its pet foods in 1985, down 19% from nearly $26 million the year before. Fancy Feast canned cat food, a "gourmet" cat food, got a 58% boost to $6.9 million in LNA measured ad spending, mostly in network and spot tv. Friskies dry cat food received $5.7 million, a 20% drop from the year earlier, while Buffet canned Tidbits cat food got $1.7 million, up from $402,000 in 1984.

In the canned cat food category worth $1.05 billion, Carnation held a leading 29.1% share in 1985, up from 28.5%, according to John C. Maxwell Jr., analyst with Furman Selz Mayer Dietz & Burney, New York. Volume grew for both Friskies Buffet and Fancy Feast, but dropped on Bright Eyes and Friskies. Heinz was No. 2 in the category at 25.3%, all of which was attributed to its top-selling 9-Lives.

Mighty Dog canned dog food got a 19% boost in measured spending, receiving $5 million, the bulk of which was in network and spot tv and the rest in magazines. Mighty Dog is Carnation's lead entry in the canned dog food category in which it holds a 12.3% share of the $860 million category. Grand Met's Alpo is far ahead with a 28.5% share.

Carnation also holds a 6.4% share in the $1.76 billion dry dog food category with market shares of 4.8% for Come 'N Get It and 1.8% for Friskies Dinner & Cubes.

In the static coffee market, Nestle follows General Foods in the instant coffee sector with a 25.2% share, compared with GF's 43.4%. Procter & Gamble is third with 19.3%, according to Mr. Maxwell's estimates.

Nestle's Taster's Choice decaffeinated coffee has a 6.6% share of the instant market and Nestle's Nescafe a 2.1% share. Decaffeinated, a subsegment of the instant coffee market, represents about 25% of that market.

In over-all spending in the coffee category, General Foods far outpaces its competitors. It spent $87.8 million in 1985 versus P&G's $47.8 million and Nestle's $37.7 million.

Nestle's coffees, teas and cocoas got a marginal 5% boost in ad spending in 1985. Those measured figures include $1.9 million received by MJB coffee, acquired in April, 1985.

Nescafe instant coffee was the single most heavily supported Nestle brand in 1985, with $10.6 million in measured ad spending, mostly in network and spot tv. This was an 82% increase over the year earlier.

Taster's Choice decaffeinated coffee got an 8.2% boost in measured ad spending, to $6.8 million in 1985. Spending for Taster's Choice freeze-dried decaffeinated increased to $57,800 from $3,000 while ad spending for Taster's Choice combined regular and decaf advertising dropped to $1.1 million from $1.7 million. Measured spending for Taster's Choice instant coffee plunged to $2.9 million from $11.6 million. However, $7.5 million was spent on a new Taster's Choice brand, Taster's Choice Maragor Bold regular and decaffeinated coffee.

The Hills Bros. brand received $4.3 million, up 30.7%, and all in spot tv advertising.

The coffee industry has been in a decline since the market's 1962 peak, the only upturn occurring in 1984 when a bevy of new products were launched. Consumers are moving away from caffeinated products and hot drinks. But the decline is flattening for now, according to Mr. Maxwell. In the longer term, he believes coffee consumption will continue to decline as cold soft drinks continue to increase in popularity.

He says further segmentation will be one way to stem the decline, and that the growth of the decaffeinated segment reflects that trend.

Hills Bros. regular and sugar-free cocoa received $715,700 in measured spending while sugar-free alone received an additional $56,200.

Nestea iced tea, including instant and regular, received $5.4 million. Nestle entered the powdered drink mix category with a new sugar-free tea and fruit juice mix called Nestea Ice Teasers in April.

It was expected that the product would be backed by an $8 million introductory campaign.

Libby, McNeill & Libby spent $3.6 million on its entry, Juicy Juice, in the juice market.

That was a 74% increase over spending in 1984. Libby competes with Smucker's 100% fruit juices and its Knudsen's juice subsidiary and Campbell Soup's Juice Works, General Mills' Nature Valley Fruit Juices, Welch's and Tree Top. Libby's juices got a 58% boost to $25,000 last year.

Libby's creamed pasta products received $18,900 in measured ad spending; Libby's canned corn beef got $690,600, and canned meats, $11,800. Canned salmon, market leader in that category, was supported by $394,000 in measured spending.

Libby's operations, which were based in Chicago, were closed there and its product lines were divided between Nestle Foods in White Plains and Carnation in Los Angeles.

Measured ad spending on Nestle candy products increased 25% last year, aided partially by ad spending for recently acquired Goobers, which got $1.3 million, and Raisinets, which received $1.3 million.

Spending for Nestle's Morsels stayed flat at $14.1 million, but chocolate candy bars grew 47% to $10.7 million. Candy Works Melt Umms received $73,800. Beech Nut baby foods were supported by $3.5 million, a 4% boost, and Table Time meals for children got $30,300, a 91% increase.

Stouffer Foods Corp., which appointed a new president in June, raised its measured ad spending 24% in 1985 for its highly successful line of frozen entrees and products.

Frozen entrees received $9.1 million, a 2.9% boost; frozen Lean Cuisine entrees nearly $15 million, up 36%; frozen pizza, $5.3 million, up 24.3%, and frozen side dishes, $3.5 million, up 39%. Frozen meat pies, which were not measured in 1984, received $211,200 last year.

Stouffer's Hotels received $1.5 million in 1985, down from $1.9 million in 1984, and Stouffer's restaurants received $12,400, down from $18,600 the year before. Lotte Hotel, Seoul, received $148,100 in 1985, increased from $48,000 in 1984.

U.S. advertising	163	185	(1.6)

Nissan Motor Corp. in USA, a subsidiary of Nissan Motor Co. Ltd., Tokyo, which is repositioning several auto lines in 1986, is actually dropping total spending to match the virtual absence of new offerings.

However, Nissan has introduced new truck models this January and upgraded its Sentra for model year 1987 in March, the latter aimed at new and richer consumers. Nissan reportedly is spending the largest outlay in its history for the Sentra introduction. The company also has upgraded its 1987 Stanza and Maxima models. The shakedown in advertising in 1985 did not seem to hurt the momentum of the auto company, which maintained its market share while establishing record unit sales levels for Nissan in the U.S. in both autos and trucks.

The parent, Nissan Motor Co. Ltd., which does not break down sales figures for its U.S. subsidiary, reported worldwide earnings in fiscal 1986 ended March 31 of $265.4 million, down 12.8% from 1985, on sales of $15.4 billion, up 3.8%. Sales and earnings figures for both fiscal years were converted from yen to dollars at an average annual exchange rate of Y244=US$1.

Calendar year figures compiled by the Japan Automobile Manufacturers Assn. put Nissan worldwide production for 1985 at 3,627,532 units, including 1,058,248 trucks, up slightly in both car and truck categories over calendar 1984. Those figures include its U.S. plant production—43,810 units of the best-selling Sentra and 107,422 pickup trucks—turned out at the factory in Smyrna, Tenn. Combined car and truck output at Smyrna is expected to reach 240,000 a year by the spring of 1987. Nissan's U.S. presence also includes the Nissan Design International studios in San Diego, Cal., and Nissan Research & Development, Ann Arbor, Mich.

The 1985 unit sales of imported Nissan cars and trucks totaled a record 790,973 units—535,772 passenger cars and 255,601 compact trucks—up 12.8% over 1984. This gave Nissan a 6.1% share of the total U.S. market (imports and exports), up from 4.5% in 1984, but still second behind Toyota at 6.7%, and followed by Honda at 6.3% and Mazda at 2.4%. Nissan also increased its share of the total import market in 1985 to 21.3%, up from 20% a year earlier. Nissan was again second behind Toyota at 23.4%, followed by Honda at 6.3% and Mazda at 2.4%.

Nissan truck sales in the U.S., up 22.2%, represented 32.3% of all Nissan units sold in the U.S. in 1985, up from 29.5% the previous year. Truck production at Smyrna accounted for 42% of all Nissan trucks sold in this country during 1985. In early 1986, Kazutoshi Hagiwara, the new president of Nissan Motor Corp. USA, predicted a rise in the company's combined auto and truck sales to 1 million per year by 1990, more of them upscale, higher priced units.

The best-selling Sentra, priced at $5,499 for the standard five-speed, two-door sedan ($5,999 for the 1987 model), accounted for sales of 179,235 units, down 5.4% from the 189,480 units in 1984, but once again the No. 1 selling import model in the U.S.

With output of 10,000 Sentras a month at the plant in Smyrna, Nissan will be able to import additional units and more upscale models from Japan, easing the self-imposed restrictions of the voluntary restraint agreement on all Japanese cars.

Sales of other Nissan models in 1985, compared with the previous year, were Pulsar 49,816 (37,287),

With no new models introduced last fall, the 1986 model year represented a continuation of the conversion from Datsun to Nissan as the dealer sign change program entered its final stages. Nissan advertising, under the "Name is Nissan" umbrella theme begun in May, 1985, focused on building brand awareness and positioning Nissan as an innovative leader of technologically advanced, quality-built cars and trucks. The new slogan replaced the 18-month-old "Major Motion" theme, which several critics had labeled as ineffective.

Nissan compact trucks accounted for more than $38 million in measured media spending, the most of any Nissan product, according to Leading National Advertisers. Most went into spot and network tv. Truck promotions relied heavily on an interest rate subvention program designed to overcome high interest rates on financing.

Nissan's biggest media cut was in network tv where it cut spending by 31% from 1984. It continued its high profile on network sporting events—"NFL Monday Night Football," the Super Bowl, Rose Bowl and College Football Assn. football.

Measured media spending trends for 1985 showed 35.2% of the total measured dollar going to spot tv; network tv, 27.3%; magazines, 13.4%; newspapers, 12.9%, and spot radio, 9.1%, with lesser amounts in the remaining measured media. Nissan continued to augment traditional national media with with strong support in local markets, particularly in truck markets.

The fourth quarter of 1985 saw the introduction of the Nissan van and Nissan sport/utility vehicles, which received about $10 million in ad support. Balance of the 1986 model year found Nissan cars getting about half of the company's ad budget.

The company introduced in January, 1986, a new truck with a V6, 3.0-liter engine and a base price of $6,299, developed by the Nissan Design Center in San Diego, Cal., but built in Japan. Positioned for young buyers in the compact truck market, the truck received spot and network tv, radio, print and direct marketing support.

Nissan splashed the new model via four commercials during the Jan. 26 Super Bowl telecast. Network tv spots were supported by spot buys in 90 of the top truck-buying markets. Nissan also made use of an eight-page insert in 42 sports magazines, and in newspapers and outdoor boards during the first three weeks of the campaign.

The company augmented its 1986 truck lineup with an electronically fuel-injected engine for the four-wheel-drive ST model, which was available in regular-bed, long bed and King Cab body styles. Among its truck models, Nissan offered no less than 23 two-wheel-drive and four-wheel-drive models. Suggested retail prices ranged from $5,999 for the 2wd standard regular-bed pickup to $10,595 for the 4wd King Cab ST model.

Early this year Nissan promoted a 7.7% annual percentage rate for new truck customers as a sales incentive. The financing program that currently applies to 1986 and 1987 pickup trucks and cab-and-chassis units. Nissan has spent an estimated $20 million in media during the first two months of 1986 on its line of compact pickups.

In mid-March Nissan unveiled part of its 1987 line, including upgraded versions of its Sentra, Stanza and Maxima. The redesigned Sentra was repositioned and aimed at the middle-class consumer, along with a shift in pricing structure from $5,000 to $7,000 per vehicle. It was also on the receiving end of a two-month, $15 million broadcast and print campaign, which rolled out in early April.

Tv spots debuted in late March on the CBS telecast of the NCAA basketball championship and the ABC series "Hardcastle and McCormick." The 1987 Sentra print campaign featured a four-color spread in weekly and monthly consumer magazines.

At the same time, the $15,199 Maxima luxury nameplate was introduced with a minor facelift for 1987. The Maxima was backed with advertising that positioned it as a fully equipped, technologically advanced sports sedan offering superior value for the money.

Noxell Corp., which markets cosmetic, toiletry and household products that include Cover Girl, Noxzema and Lestoil, is stimulating flat advertising spending in 1985 with new product launches in 1986.

Leading the new entries is the launch of the 85-item Clarion line, which gives Noxell an extended pricing tier. Complementing Noxell's popular midpriced Cover Girl line, Clarion is priced at $3.55 to $4.50—some 20% to 30% higher than Cover Girl.

Clarion, to be launched this September, offers sensitivity tested and fragrance-free foundation, eye and lip products. The pink-and-blue packaged Clarion line will be backed by $15 million in marketing support in a national rollout campaign from SSC&B, New York, agency for Cover Girl. Distribution will be on Cover Girl turf—drug and food stores and mass merchandising outlets.

The impact of steeper prices, according to Lynne Hyman, analyst with Smith Barney, should be minimized by the trend toward greater discretionary income, stronger concerns about skin sensitivity and the target audience, a slightly older woman. In-store computers will help customers select shades of makeup to complement their skin tone.

The Clarion line is seen as helping drive up sales this year. Value Line analyst Marilyn M. Royce predicts Noxell's sales should reach $440 million in the current fiscal year, an increase of 15.2%, based on growth largely from existing business, which brought sales to $115.6 million in the first quarter of 1986, and the rapport Noxell has with the retail community.

In Noxell's toiletries segment, tests are under way on Perio-Gene, a remedial dental care system. Perio-Gene represents Noxell's desire to diversify beyond beauty products. The product consists of two tubes in a single package, one containing a hydrogen peroxide gel, the other a mint-flavored baking soda compound. Perio-Gene is directed at those with gum disease.

Retailing at $3.09 for a 3.6-oz. tube, Perio-Gene will not storm the market as a bargain brand. What it does offer is convenience and palatability to those who have had to concoct their own mixtures to battle gum disease. William Esty Co. will handle advertising once the product moves to market.

In cosmetics, Noxell's Cover Girl line, which includes face and eye makeup, lipsticks and nail polishes, maintained a double-digit growth (11%) in sales in 1985, although the rate was slower than in previous years.

Cover Girl's sales accounted for 61% of the company's total net sales—a performance attributed by company officials to new product launches and gains from existing lines. About $43 million in measured advertising supported the Cover Girl line in 1985, slightly exceeding the budget of a close competitor, Schering-Plough's Maybelline. Noxell reportedly is allocating about $50 million to promote the Cover Girl lines in 1986.

About 30% of Cover Girl's revenues come from food stores, compared with 15% for other mass marketers of cosmetics, which prefer to concentrate on other outlets, such as drugstores. The Cover Girl lineup is promoted by Cheryl Tiegs, Christie Brinkley, Kelly Emberg, Carol Alt and newcomer Renee Simonson among others, all of whom sport "that Cover Girl look."

Face makeup—liquid, powder and blush products—is Cover Girl's oldest product area and the source of its strongest growth. Cover Girl's liquid foundations command a 35% to 37% share of the liquid makeup market, according to Ms. Hyman. A new liquid foundation targeted to older women, Cover Girl's Replenishing makeup, was marketed nationally in 1985. Moisture Wear makeup line received $2.2 million in ad support.

Cover Girl's pressed powders, which hold a 48% share of the pressed powder market, according to Ms. Hyman, received close to $19 million in measured support for its Cover Girl, Oil Control and Moisture Wear brands.

Eye makeup attained new highs for Cover Girl both in sales and share. Mascara received the largest amount of media backing, $10.7 million, to amass a 29% share of the supermarket dollars, according to Diana Temple, analyst with Salomon Brothers. Maybelline leads the mascara category with a 53.1% share, Ms. Temple says.

Noxell's mascara sales were aided by the June, 1985, introduction of Lasting Performance gel-based, waterproof mascara, and by a restaged Long 'n Lush mascara. Clean Lash, a new waterproof mascara removable with soap and water, was shipped to distributors in February of this year.

The Spunsatin eye shadow line of three and four-kit collections continued to grow and were joined by a single-kit line extension. Pro Colors singles kits were promoted as "The Shadow Spectrum for Eyes." The shadows are offered in an organizer "cabinet." Cover Girl had a 24% share of the eyeliner category last year, to Maybelline's 54.2% share.

In the eyeliner segment, Cover Girl's Pro-Lining pencils remain the No. 1 brand in its category. The pencils attained a 38.5% share of supermarket dollars, close on the heels of Maybelline's 39% share, Ms. Temple says. The eye makeup segment received close to $12.5 million in media backing.

Cover Girl's lipstick sales continued to outpace the over-all lipstick market, led by double-digit growth of the Luminesse line. At midyear, Cover Girl's Continuous Color lipstick, Noxell's regular line, was restaged with a new, longer-wearing formula, in an effort to revitalize that line. Continuous Color is supported by tv and print featuring model Cheryl Tiegs. Over-all, Cover Girl's share of the supermarket sales in lipsticks was 18% compared with Maybelline's 34.8% and Revlon's 10.6%, Ms. Temple says.

Nail polish, a highly competitive category, saw Cover Girl increase its volume.

It leads the supermarket dollar sales with a 28.6% share, followed by Cutex at 14.2%, Maybelline with 11.3% and Revlon with 9.7%, according to Ms. Temple. Cover Girl's premium line of nail polish, Opulence, showed solid sales growth in its second year on the market. Ten Terrific Nails treatment line also did well in its second year in stores.

Luminesse Satin Finish nail color was introduced in the first quarter of 1986.

Cosmetic dollar sales at Noxell totaled about $237 million. A firm believer in promotion, Noxell sent 5.4 billion Cover Girl sales messages to the women of America last year—enough to reach 97% of women 1½ times each week all year. It seems to have paid, particularly in the second half of the year, as Noxell's sales growth exceeded industry increases for several cosmetic and skincare product categories, including lipsticks, mascaras and Noxzema skin cream.

The toiletries products sector advanced its sales in both dollars and units as more women turned to Noxzema skin cream, which had an increase of 18% in sales.

Noxzema skin cream, Noxell's 71-year-old flagship product, entered the market in a pump dispenser in June, 1985.

It encouraged both use by new consumers and increased consumption over-all. Noxzema skin cream now holds between a 19% and 20% share of the market, up from 15.5% before the pump version. In supermarket sales, Noxzema skin cream amassed an 18.1% share, not too far behind leader Procter & Gamble's Oil of Olay (through P&G's acquisition of Richardson-Vick's), which held a 23.8% share over-all last year, Ms. Temple says.

Noxell's line of shave creams bearing the Noxzema brand name took an 11.2% share of supermarket dollars, aided by a new product introduction and several line extensions. Gillette Co.'s Trac II and Foamy shave cream products lead the market with a combined 25.1% share of supermarket dollars, according to Ms. Temple. Noxzema shave cream for heavy beard growth rolled nationally in January of this year. William Esty Co., New York, handled the introductory advertising. The new product may enjoy brisk sales among the market segment members it strives to reach because, as Ms. Hyman says, "Research shows 25% of those with heavy beards shave twice a day."

A musk-scented version of Noxzema shave cream bowed to the public last June to replace a less contemporary Wild Forest fragrance formula. Advertising was aimed at both the men's and women's markets, and included mail-in coupon offers and trial sizes.

One Noxzema namesake fell by the wayside as Noxell nixed a national rollout of Noxzema hand and body lotion.

Another Noxell product in the same category, little-advertised Raintree skin cream, experienced further market share slippage, from 1.1% to 0.6% within a year.

President and ceo George L. Bunting became chairman, succeeding his father, G. Lloyd Bunting, who became chairman emeritus at the age of 77. Marvin L. Hathaway, exec vp and chief operating officer-domestic, succeeds Mr. Bunting as president, while retaining his former title. Robert W. Pierce, Noxell's treasurer, was promoted to vp, finance.

Noxell's future direction includes the pursuit of acquisitions.

But, as new chairman Mr. Bunting outlined in his letter to shareholders in February, much of Wall Street zeroed in on the same target—consumer product companies—so "we were unable to find a meaningful opportunity at an appropriate price."

J.C. Penney Co., the nation's third largest retailer, launched cost-saving measures including decentralized buying via satellite and eliminating unprofitable stores in nonmetropolitan areas in 1985 as it continued its shift back to the basics by moving toward more colorful, standard goods at moderate prices.

This shift to more conservative, but still fashionable, goods began in the mid-1980s, and although Penney has been upgrading its taste levels, it has found that shoppers' preferences have not changed much in some categories.

The company, with sales up only 1.9% and earnings down 8.7% in 1985, also sought to control advertising expenses, which had risen 22.3% in 1984 over 1983 as a result of communicating its repositioning to consumers.

Financial results at Penney, which began to improve in the fourth quarter of fiscal 1985, continued into the first half of 1986. Net income for the six-month period ended July 26 jumped 36.2% to $109 million on sales of $6.27 billion, up 7.7%. Solid sales gains and fewer markdowns by sales and catalogs contributed to the improved results, as did tight expense controls.

During 1985, the bulk of Penney's sales were generated by its metropolitan stores, divided into department stores with sales of $9.52 billion, up 2.5% from 1984 in comparative units, and soft-line stores with sales of $858 million, up 0.8% in comparative units.

Another $1.78 billion in sales was contributed by Penney's geographic market stores located in nonmetropolitan areas and in satellite towns within metropolitan areas. Penney reduced the number of these stores from 821 to 753 in 1985 and is continuing to close unproductive stores as it moves into new markets and to modernize existing stores. Partly as a result of this reduction in stores, sales of the geographic stores dropped from $1.82 billion in 1984. Catalog sales departments in these stores also contributed to profit.

During the year, Penney moved its catalog account in-house from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles. In 1985, Penney catalog sales were $2 billion, up 3.7%. Catalog sales departments are a part of all Penney stores as well as some drugstores (Thrifty Drugs and Treasury Drug Centers) and are also run as stand-alone operations. The catalog units were a major reason for Penney's strong fourth-quarter movement. Catalog sales in the quarter increased 14.9%.

Montgomery Ward's exit from catalogs was a factor in boosting Penney's catalog sales, but Penney made significant gains in 1985 in markets where Ward was not a major factor. "Penney views the response to its catalogs as further confirmation that its merchandising shift toward more colorful, basic goods at moderate price points is being well received," according to a report by L.F. Rothschild, Unterberg, Towbin, which tracks the retail industry.

Penney had a slow start in 1983 and 1984 after setting its sights on the more upscale. In some merchandise areas Penney has decided that after moving "ahead one step, it had to move back a half step" to more conservative merchandise, says Edward F. Johnson of Wall Street's "Johnson Redbook." He believes, however, the shift will pay.

The company insists this is not a reversal and does not mean it is returning to a lower price emphasis. It means the company is seeking a balance between lower, middle and upper price tiers. The company notes that independent studies show substantial increases in Penney's share of the total soft-goods market—particularly women's, men's and children's apparel and soft home furnishings—since the repositioning started. Penney's own studies say repositioning has changed consumer perceptions about Penney's ambiance, fashion and service.

In 1985, Penney spent $15.8 million to advertise men's and women's clothes, another $6.7 million for women's apparel by itself and $5.7 million for men's. It also spent another $24.4 million on general advertising, according to Leading National Advertisers. The combined advertising spending for men's and women's was below 1984 levels of $22.9 million but still above a 1983 budget of $11.9 million.

One way Penney is more finely tailoring its merchandise mix is by decentralizing its buying programs. Instead of requiring all stores to carry merchandise that might not be suited to regional tastes or needs, Penney increasingly is using satellite tv as a platform for New York buyers to beam their message to local stores. The stores can then decide if a fashion shown on the tv monitor will play in their town. The satellite system is operated by Private Satellite Network of which Penney owns a 15% interest.

Operating since July, 1985, the system is in use in 165 locations and has saved Penney $3 million in travel and related expenses, plus the money lost when stores have to run markdowns because fashion trends popular elsewhere won't fly in a certain area.

By chance, if not by design, Penney fashion promotions also appear to have become more conservative in the past year. Penney started fashion promotions in 1984 with its Salute to Italy and followed that up in 1985 with Best of Britain, which was advertised with a $9 million print and tv campaign.

For 1986, however, Penney stayed closer to home with a celebration of American Style tied into the Statue of Liberty centennial. On May 11, the company kicked off a $24 million ad campaign in support of the promotion but allocated 70% of the budget to newspaper preprints instead of the glitzier tv commercials it had used in the past for fashion promotions.

Penney, as part of its fashion makeover, introduced the Halston III line in 1983 and in 1984, but has "dropped back a bit on fashion in the Halston III line," Mr. Johnson says, noting the line is doing "fairly well" but that Penney is designing "more of the line itself."

Analysts are speculating that Penney is interested in more than the 20% ownership it recently bought for $8 million in Alcott & Andrews, the regional specialty store chain.

In 1985, Penney increased its number of drugstores, operating under Thrifty Drug and Treasury Drug Center, to 374 from 369 as sales rose 8.5% to $641 million.

The company's Belgian stores, operate under the Sarma name. They sell food, apparel and general merchandise and had a sales decline of 3.3%, to $472 million in 1985—the third consecutive year of sales losses.

PepsiCo benefited from archrival Coca-Cola Co.'s reformulation of its flagship brand as its soft drink sales grew 7.6% worldwide in 1985, while in 1986 it has added Kentucky Fried Chicken, potentially boosting restaurant group sales past those of its segment-leading soft drink business.

The Coke reformulation helped Pepsi-Cola to retain its title as the largest selling soft drink in food stores, although Coke remains the undisputed king in the fountain and vending machine segments. Yet, Pepsi's market share in March, 1986, was 18.9%, down from 19.5% in March, 1985, compared with Coke's 17.2% share for the combined Coke and Coke Classic varieties, a drop from 18.1% the prior year. Analysts attributed the Pepsi brand loss in part to the Slice introduction because Slice dilutes the cola market.

Despite its dip in market share, PepsiCo took advantage of Coca-Cola's marketing snafu by gloating in the media. Pepsi claimed a 1985 victory in the cola wars with a BBDO-designed newspaper ad, signed by Pepsi-Cola USA president Roger Enrico, stating, "After 87 years of going at it eyeball to eyeball, the other guy just blinked."

In July, Pepsi broke two spots featuring a character named Wilbur, who in his confusion over new and old Coke, decides on a Pepsi. In promotional efforts, Pepsi sniggered at Coke by dispensing free Pepsis outside the site of a Coke reformulation analyst briefing.

In an effort to further close the gap on Coke's wide international marketing lead, PepsiCo earlier this year announced plans to purchase Seven-Up Co. from Philip Morris for $380 million, but that was scotched by the Federal Trade Commission. Pepsi then agreed to purchase the international business of Seven-Up, which is outside the purview of the FTC. Coca-Cola, which at the same time announced plans to acquire Dr Pepper Co., also got nixed by the FTC and bowed out as a buyer.

Pepsi-Cola soft drink brands, helped substantially by the success of Slice, its 10% juice drink introduced in 1984, reached $12 billion in the $39 billion U.S. soft drink category. Slice's sales totaled $465 million at retail, and as of October, 1985, the brand had garnered a 2.1% market share, while still available in only 60% of the country. By year's end, Pepsi had increased Slice's distribution to 75%.

As juice-based entries have taken off, led by Slice, No. 1 in the $6 billion citrus segment, analysts warned that flavors may potentially erode the 63% share of the soft drink market colas currently hold.

Pepsi has taken advantage of its head start in the juice-added category by extending its Slice line to include mandarin orange, apple and cherry cola flavors. The cherry cola flavor will go head to head with Cherry Coke, which in the first quarter of 1986 held a 1.7% share. Advertising spending for Slice, via J. Walter Thompson USA's "We've Got the Juice" campaign, was $12.7 million, with an additional $5.1 million for Diet Slice in 1985, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Slice joined a roster of five brands raking in more than $350 million yearly in U.S. retail sales in 1985, including flagship Pepsi, Mountain Dew (which as of March, 1986, held a 2.5% national share of the soft drink market), Diet Pepsi (with a 4.3% national share), Pepsi Free and Diet Pepsi Free.

Although network tv spending decreased 10% for Pepsi-Cola in 1986, LNA put its network spending at an estimated $20 million, with an additional $64.6 million in spot tv. Pepsi has maintained high visibility through its star-studded network advertising campaigns. Encouraged by the success of the reported $5 million contract with singer Michael Jackson in 1984 as a Pepsi endorser, Pepsi reportedly doubled its offer in May, 1986, signing Mr. Jackson to a multiyear contract that includes his services as a "creative consultant" and possibly as a director for a Pepsi spot. Once again, Mr. Jackson's contract does not require him to touch a Pepsi can.

The cola wars spilled over into the entertainment sector in 1985, with Coke and Pepsi vying for big-name endorsers. Pepsi, continuing with its modern, high-tech "Choice of a New Generation" theme designed by BBDO, counted among its paid supporters New York Mets pitcher Dwight Gooden, former Oakland A's and New York Yankees pitcher Jim "Catfish" Hunter, teen music group

Test Marketing Breakthrough:

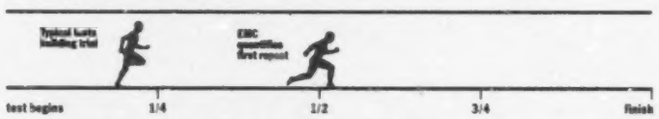
Count your new product winnings or cut your losses in half the time.

Introducing Early MarketCast., a revolutionary system that collapses the time needed to assess long-term volume potential.

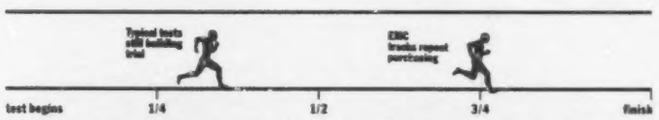
Today you face enormous pressure to make a "go/no go" decision early on in test. Commitments for capital expenditures and marketing budgets must be made... plans must be ready for a peak season rollout... a competitor could be gearing up to preempt your launch...

Unfortunately, compelling reasons often force you to make a major risk decision to roll out before the most important component of new product success — repeat purchasing — can be assessed accurately.

Now you can make a confident rollout decision early in the race. As an overlay to test market programs, Early MarketCast provides repeat purchase data as early as six months into a test, compared to 12 to 18 months for typical tests. We give you a running start by collapsing the time needed to generate trial. For example:



As early as month three, Early MarketCast begins reading first repeat purchasing based on actual consumer behavior. In a typical test, trial is just building.



Early MarketCast tracks multiple repeat purchasing as early as months four or five. In a typical test, you would still be reading trial volume build.

Early MarketCast combines the technology and analytical skills of the BASES and Test Marketing Group divisions of Burke Marketing Services, Inc. Menudo (via J. Walter Thompson USA, which handled Pepsi's Hispanic advertising and was succeeded this year by Siboney Advertising), former vice-presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro, San Francisco 49ers quarterback Joe Montana (a two-year deal for $400,000), Miami Dolphins quarterback Dan Marino, Lionel Richie (including a tour sponsorship), gymnast Kurt Thomas (for Slice via JWT), former "Saturday Night Live" star Billy Crystal (for Diet Pepsi's reformulation), "Miami Vice" star Don Johnson and former Eagles band member Glenn Frey (in a two-minute spot directed by Ridley Scott) and "Family Ties" star Michael J. Fox.

In international markets, Pepsi Canada Ltd. signed former Monty Python troupe member John Cleese for Pepsi Free and Diet Pepsi spots and highlighted singer Tina Turner in a $20 million, Ogilvy & Mather-produced Pepsi-Cola campaign, teaming her with foreign rock stars. Pepsi also reportedly negotiated with comedian Eddie Murphy for a $3 million deal that fell through and offered to sponsor a Rolling Stones tour.

BBDO's "Archeology" spot for Pepsi received critical acclaim in 1985, including a gold One Club Award in May; the coveted Grand Prize at the Cannes International Film Festival in July, and three awards—a grand award, soft drink and copywriting award—for the best tv commercial at the International Film & TV Festival of New York in November.

BBDO also won awards at Cannes for two other Pepsi spots, a silver lion for "Robots" and a bronze lion for "Space Shuttle," and a gold award at the IFTV for its Lionel Richie "Block Party" spot for Pepsi. Another Pepsi agency, J. Walter Thompson USA, won a Clio for its "Over the top" commercial in June.

The cola battle bubbled furiously in July when Coca-Cola pulled its commercials from the ABC-TV coverage of Live Aid, protesting Pepsi's corporate sponsorship and signage at the event. In December, Pepsi became a principal sponsor of Turner Broadcasting System's Goodwill Games, broadcast from Moscow in July, 1986, for an estimated $6 million.

In addition, Pepsi put up $1 million to sponsor "Walk Through Rock," a multimedia music exhibit in Denver, and purchased four-week flights on Screenvision Cinema Network's 4,500 movie screens in March. A "Pepsi's Young Astronauts" promotion was scuttled in February after the space shuttle Challenger disaster.

In its snack food segment represented by Frito-Lay, Dallas, sales accounted for virtually half the $6 billion salty snack market. The 5% sales growth, however, was substantially lower than 1984's 11% growth over the previous year. The company says the modest rise reflected international growth, offset by slower unit growth at Frito-Lay. Operating profits for the segment increased 2% in 1985 domestically. In 1985, PepsiCo derived nearly half its operating profits from this segment, however.

Doritos was its biggest seller in 1985, with $715 million in retail sales. Lay's potato chips followed closely with $510 million in retail sales and Ruffles with $495 million. O'Grady's, launched with a $25 million campaign in February, 1984, reached $170 million in retail sales in 1985, up from $100 million the prior year. Spending for O'Grady's was $7.5 million in 1985 out of total Frito-Lay spending of $55 million, according to seven-media totals in LNA.

In 1985, Frito-Lay launched Fritos Chili Cheese corn chips, Doritos Cool Ranch tortilla chips, Lay's Jalapeno and Cheddar potato chips, and test marketed McCracken's brand apple chips.

In the sweet segment, Frito tested Rumbles, a bite-sized granola snack nugget, and Stuffers, a filled snack. PepsiCo spent $2.6 million—a drop from $5 million in 1984—backing its ailing national chewy cookie line, Grandma's. The slow growth of the soft cookie segment over-all, which garnered only about $560 million of the total $6 billion cookie market, prompted PepsiCo to introduce a smaller 4-oz. package of its Rich 'n Chewy cookies to raise its 5.8% share of the soft cookie segment. Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, is Grandma's agency.

Frito-Lay is far behind soft cookie market leaders, RJR/Nabisco (37.4% share), P&G's Duncan Hines (28.4%) and Keeblers (27.6%). The repackaging caused PepsiCo to incur a $16 million charge.

In the foodservice sector, which in 1985 included Taco Bell, La Petite Boulangerie and Pizza Hut, a 13% growth in sales accompanied a 22% growth in operating profits to $194 million. The big news in the division, however, was the announced acquisition in mid-1986 of Kentucky Fried Chicken from RJR/Nabisco for $850 million.

Restaurants, of which PepsiCo operates more than 3,500 company-managed units and franchises more than 3,700, account for about one-quarter of PepsiCo's operating profits. KFC will add 6,500 units worldwide and sales of $3.5 billion. Company-owned restaurants provided RJR with $1.1 billion in sales and operating profit of $91.5 million in 1985.

Currently, only 1,000 of the KFC restaurants sell PepsiCo soft drinks. The remainder sell Coca-Cola products. PepsiCo is out to convert these units once contracts expire. Analysts predict that if all units converted to Pepsi, it would affect Coca-Cola revenues by only 1%. KFC management is moving over from RJR. Richard P. Mayer, chairman-ceo of KFC, continues to head the fast food marketer.

In May, 1986, Steve Reinemund, previously exec vp of Pizza Hut, was named president, succeeding Arthur Gunther, who moved to president-ceo of La Petite Boulangerie.

In the $10 billion domestic pizza category, of which PepsiCo holds a 20% share, the company spent $15 million promoting Priazzo, a deep-dish pizza introduction at Wichita-based Pizza Hut. The 1985 campaign, by Chiat/Day, Los Angeles, helped Priazzo achieve a retail sales level of $85 million since its introduction in June.

Applying the big-name strategy used in its soft drink marketing, in 1985 PepsiCo continued its "Pizza Hut People" Chiat/Day campaign using celebrities Martin Mull, Rita Moreno, Susan Anton and "Marvelous" Marvin Hagler. LNA measured Pizza Hut spending at $64.4 million in 1985, up from $58.4 million in 1984.

Pizza Hut in 1985 built 63 company-operated restaurants and added 118 franchised Pizza Huts and predicted greater additions in 1986. The company also agreed to acquire A&M Food Services, its largest franchisee with 150 restaurants, in 1986. Pizza Hut began 80 home-delivery units in 12 test markets and plans to expand the home-delivery business in 1986.

Taco Bell, PepsiCo's entry in the $1.4 billion Mexican category, jazzed up its offerings with new entrees in 1985 including Pizzazz pizza, which generated $55 million in sales for its first year. Pizzazz pizza agency is Tracy/Locke, Dallas. Taco salad, introduced in 1984, generated $85 million in sales. LNA places Taco Bell spending at $39.3 million in measured media in 1985, up 10.6%.

The company attributed its growth in the Mexican segment to the redesign of Taco Bell begun in 1984, its addition of 270 company-operated and 140 franchised units in 1985 and its increased ad spending.

PepsiCo also underwent several top-level management changes in the first quarter of 1986. Donald M. Kendall, previously chairman-ceo, moved to chairman of the executive committee of the board. Succeeding him was D. Wayne Calloway, formerly president-chief operating officer. The company named Michael Jordan to succeed Mr. Calloway as president and discontinued the chief operating officer post. Mr. Jordan was exec vp-finance and administration.

Mr. Jordan was succeeded by Robert Dettmer as exec vp-chief financial officer, from president, Pepsi-Cola Bottling Group, a post taken by Craig Weatherup, formerly senior vp-sales and marketing for the group. Roger Enrico was moved up to president-ceo of Pepsi-Cola Co., from president-ceo Pepsi-Cola USA, the U.S. soft drink unit. Ronald Tidmore became president, Pepsi-Cola USA, succeeding Mr. Enrico. Mr. Tidmore was previously president of the foodservice division. Succeeding him in that post was John Cranor, previous president of the Wilson Sporting Goods division.

PepsiCo completed the sale of its Wilson Sporting Goods division in September to Wesray Capital Corp. for $121 million in cash and $42 million face amount of preferred stock. Wilson had lost $16.7 million on $248 million in sales in 1984. The sale of PepsiCo's North American Van Lines to Norfolk Southern Corp. for $376 million was completed in June. The sale of Lee Way Motor Freight, its other transportation facility, was completed in 1984 and reflected PepsiCo's concentration on its core businesses.

On the acquisition front, PepsiCo continued to pursue the purchase of bottling networks to increase its share. In May, the company purchased the Allegheny Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co. for $160 million, with the intention of refranchising it. Pepsi also agreed to purchase MEI Corp., another bottler in 19 states, for $590 million.

Pfizer Inc., which produces and markets a range of consumer products including Barbasol, Ben-Gay, Visine, Coty and Stetson fragrances, sits with $1.2 billion in cash and securities waiting for the right acquisition.

During 1985, the company failed in its efforts to grow by acquisition when it was snubbed in its attempt to buy Richardson-Vicks, which subsequently went to Procter & Gamble, and G.D. Searle & Co., which ultimately made its bed with Monsanto Co.

A marriage with G.D. Searle probably would have enhanced Pfizer's marketing efforts with a new, as-yet-unnamed, low-calorie sweetener that may prove to be a competitor to Searle's aspartame. The product, in the "late stage of testing," is claimed by Pfizer officials to have greater sweetening power than aspartame.

To add to its loss in the unsuccessful bid to acquire Searle, Pfizer lost its president of Pfizer Pharmaceuticals, Sheldon G. Gilgore, who went to Searle as its president-ceo. He was replaced by William C. Steere, who has served as corporate vp-exec vp, Pfizer Pharmaceutical Products.

Pfizer was successful in its bid to acquire American Medical Systems in May, 1985. The company markets implantable urological devices, including a prosthesis for impotent men, which helped AMS sales grow at an annual rate of 44% last year. A $5 million equity investment, representing a 10% acquisition, was made in Angiomedics, a catheter manufacturer.

In 1985, Pfizer reported a 3.8% growth in sales, topping $4 billion for the first time, and a 13% increase in net income. More than 40% of sales came from outside the U.S. Sales have been affected by largely unfavorable exchange rates and steps taken in various countries to trim healthcare costs —notable among these is Japan, Pfizer's largest overseas market where the government reduced drug prices by 9% last year.

Pfizer's consumer division, its fourth largest segment, accounting for 8% of total sales, is its most heavily advertised. Virtually all Pfizer's measured media total, with the exception of its $3.4 million in farm and professional publications, is attributed to the consumer segment, in which sales come largely from the U.S. with sizable international contributions from the U.K., Canada and Mexico.

The consumer group's Leeming/Pacquin division supported Visine eyedrops with $13 million in measured media support, the same as in 1984. The division's second largest expenditure of $8.2 million, up 3.8%, went to media support of Ben-Gay, although it failed to muster momentum as sales declined.

Sales of Barbasol shaving cream together with its companion deodorant products were up 18% as $2.6 million in measured media was spent, all on on network, spot and cable tv, up from only $2,100 in 1984. The division's Desitin baby products received only minor magazine coverage.

The Coty division witnessed significant growth in the men's fragrance line, which accounted for 31% of Coty's U.S. sales last year, led by a strong showing by Stetson cologne and aftershave for men, which grew by 21% in sales. Stetson for men was supported by nearly $6.5 million in measured media, up 20%. A $5 million Christmas campaign prepared by Warwick Advertising aired a week earlier than usual in order to protect Stetson's strong sales.

Lady Stetson for women was introduced Sept. 1 in a campaign by Hicks & Greist, New York. The new fragrance is backed by a $5 million budget for its national rollout. The line is targeted to the 18-to-34-year-old heavy fragrance user and is being marketed as an extension of the men's fragrance.

Coty's Wild Musk, with $3.3 million in measured media support, up from $890,000 in 1984, was its largest selling women's product last year, increasing sales despite a competitive market.

Coty's product line got $17.8 million in measured spending, up from $9.5 million in 1984, which helped boost sales 17%. Cosmetics account for 25% of Coty's sales. Coty introduced Color Focus kits in December. The kits combine three eye shadows with coordinating blush and lipstick in one package.

Pfizer's second most advertised segment, healthcare, accounts for 63% of worldwide sales. U.S. sales in this pharmaceutical sector increased by 9%, while international sales declined by 2%, mainly because of the strength of the dollar abroad.

Mass media advertising is limited in this segment and virtually all Pfizer business lines except consumer products. Pfizer promoted these segments in 1985 with a reported $52 million for pharmaceutical products in professional journals, $2 million in direct mail and an estimated $20 million in educational programs. An additional $40 million was spent on personal sales force selling (detailing).

However, Pfizer soon may begin targeting the consumer directly. The FDA gave drug companies the green light at the end of last year to experiment with mass media advertising. Pfizer is reported to be seeking an agency to handl an estimated $15 million campaign that would promote such drugs as Procardia, Feldene and Minipress in print, perhaps to be followed by network tv. No agency has been chosen.

Though many of Pfizer's long-established brands continue to hold strong positions in the market, several, like Diabinese and Vibramycin, have lost market share to the generic industry. Pfizer's strategy is to continue to roll out and test new products.

Currently, Pfizer is reported to have nine pharmaceutical compounds either in late stages of development or already awaiting marketing approval, according to analyst Rudolph C. Carryl of Value Line. Sorbinil, which alleviates the late complications of diabetes, and doxazosin, a once-a-day selective alpha blocker for the treatment of hypertension, are cited as particularly promising by Mr. Carryl. Pfizer already has filed for approval in several European markets for doxazosin, which will be available under the Carduran trademark.

Pfizer is seeking approval to market its sulbactam/ampicillin, an antibiotic combined with Pfizer's beta-lactamose inhibitor, which enables the antibiotic to overcome the resistance that bacteria develop to many antibiotics. New studies also show that Pfizer's leading antibiotic, Cefobid, exhibits the same characteristic.

Finding new uses for existing drugs, like Cefobid, is another way Pfizer is hoping to expand its markets at a time when a number of its products are going off-patent. Cefobid increased sales by 17% to $145 million in 1985, making it the fastest-growing injectable antibiotic in the U.S.

The company has filed for FDA approval to expand the use of its calcium channel blocker, Procardia, currently used in the treatment of angina pectoris, to include treatment of acute hypertension. Procardia also is being used to delay and even substitute for coronary bypass surgery in selected angina sufferers.

Feldene, used for menstrual cramps and over-all pain relief, topped the pharmaceutical product list in sales with $461 million, up 14%, and making the drug the largest selling anti-arthritic in the world. Procardia came in second, with $219 million in U.S. sales.

Last year, Pfizer announced plans to collaborate with Genentech Inc. of California on a simplified process to manufacture Vitamin C using a new microorganism, a genetically modified bacteria, developed by genetic engineers at Genentech.

Philip Morris Cos., the nation's largest cigaret marketer, substantially increased its share of the package goods market in 1985 when it acquired General Foods Corp. PM also inherited an advertising budget of $450 million from General Foods.

Until its purchase of White Plains, N.Y.-based GF for $5.7 billion, Philip Morris was the least diversified of the nation's tobacco companies, with only about 10% of its operating income coming from nontobacco products, namely beer and soft drinks. Now, 43% of its operating income comes from nontobacco products, with revenues from such sources even higher.

In the second quarter of 1986, PM's net income was $377 million, up 17%, on revenues of $6.53 billion, up 76% from $3.72 billion in 1985. The substantial increase was due to a $2.5 billion contribution from GF, accounting for 38% of PM's over-all revenue. GF was purchased in November.

PM now rivals the restructured RJR/Nabisco in size among consumer products companies. In addition to General Foods, PM owns Miller Brewing Co., Seven-Up Co. and Mission Viejo Realty Group.

The international operation of Seven-Up was acquired by PepsiCo in July, 1986. The Federal Trade Commission opposed the sale of the domestic operations of Seven-Up to PepsiCo on the grounds that it would inhibit competition in the domestic soft drink market. The government body does not regulate international operations of domestic companies. The FTC also informed Coca-Cola Co. it would block its intended acquisition of Dr Pepper Co. Both PepsiCo and Coca-Cola withdrew their buyout bids.

Despite several possible ad agency conflicts that arose from the acquisition of GF, few PM accounts were shifted to other agencies. Leo Burnett USA, a major PM agency for more than 30 years, retained all of its PM cigaret accounts despite also handling Kellogg Co., a competitor of GF's Post unit. PM retained Young & Rubicam for many of its GF accounts, even though Y&R also handles several RJR accounts and recently picked up several more.

The only major agency shift came as a result of the merger this year between Saatchi & Saatchi and Ted Bates Worldwide. GF removed Bates from its Maxim and Mellow Roast coffee brands because Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide handles Procter & Gambles' High Point decaffeinated coffees. However, neither of the two brands had been supported recently.

Total measured advertising spending for the combined companies amounted to $917.6 million, representing a full year of GF folded into the measured media of PM. That figure is 5% above combined measured spending in 1984.

Apart from measured advertising, PM reported spending $1.05 billion on "advertising costs" worldwide to the SEC, up 17.5%. That figure, besides being for worldwide advertising, includes only the last quarter of spending for GF. Ad Age's U.S. estimate folded in a full year of General Foods advertising.

For 1985, sales grew 15.6% to $15.96 billion as net income rose to $1.26 billion, a 41.2% increase attributed in part to a write-down in 1984 of Miller's Trenton, O., brewery, which resulted in a decrease in net earnings for that year. Only the fourth quarter of GF returns are included in PM's financial results.

PM's tobacco business—divided into Philip Morris USA and Philip Morris International—remained the market leader in 1985 with a 35.7% share, up 0.4 share point over the previous year. Only Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., Louisville, a major manufacturer of price-value and generic cigarets, improved its market share more than PM. Among full-priced brands only, PM achieved a 38.5% market share.

Operating income for Philip Morris USA increased 17.5% in the year to $2.1 billion on sales of $6.6 billion, up 7.8%. PM USA made up 41% of PM's total sales.

The biggest contributor to PM's success in the cigaret industry continued to be Marlboro—the country's best-selling cigaret—which achieved a 22.3% market share, up 1.2 points from 1984.

PM launched Marlboro Red and Marlboro Lights in full-priced kingsize 25 packs nationally in January, 1985. It spent $87.5 million in measured advertising for the Marlboro line, according to Leading National Advertisers, nearly 11% of its total measured ad spending. LNA itemized figures do not include national newspaper spending, which can be considerable in cigaret advertising.

PM entered the price-value segment of the cigaret market in 1985 because consumer acceptance of brands in the lower priced or "value" category had reached a level it could tap. In December, PM extended its Players line when it launched nationally Players Lights 25s at the same suggested price as 20-unit cigaret packages. It was PM's first entry into the growing price-value segment.

In the beginning of this year, PM rolled national with its reformulated Cambridge cigaret line, which is cast as a branded generic. The 12mg tar cigaret is available in regular and menthol, and is PM's attempt to challenge RJR's Doral, the first branded generic.

Cambridge sells at about the same price as unbranded, no-frills and private-label generics. Advertising support is being handled by Leo Burnett USA, which has handled several other PM brands, including flagship Marlboro, for 32 years.

Virginia Slims, the best selling women's cigaret in the country with a 2.7% total market share, expanded in 1985, when PM introduced Virginia Slims Lights 120s, available in regular and menthol. Magazine, newspaper, outdoor and point-of-purchase advertising broke in October, also via Burnett. PM spent $11.8 million on the new cigaret.

Despite an ad campaign that broke in July, 1985, PM's second leading brand, Benson & Hedges, decreased its share of the domestic market last year from 4.8% to 4.7%. PM spent $37.5 million on its B&H line, handled by Wells, Rich, Greene, New York. The agency assignment was up for review among WRG, Burnett and Backer & Spielvogel with a decision due in late July.

After its merger with PM, General Foods was restructured into three operating segments: U.S. grocery products, worldwide coffee and international products, and processed meats.

During the last two months of 1985, the only period for which GF financial figures are available because of the merger with PM, General Foods had an operating income of $116 million on sales of $1.6 billion. For 1984, GF reported net income of $325 million on sales of $9.02 billion. It spent $450 million on U.S. advertising in 1984, up 13.2% from the prior year.

Crystal Light diet drink mixes, introduced in 1984, remained the leader in the NutraSweet-flavored powdered drink mix category, despite challenges from Thomas J. Lipton Inc. and Sunkist. Measured ad spending in 1985 totaled nearly $18 million. GF began testing several new products under the Crystal Light name in 1985, including three new flavors and decaffeinated fruit teas.

GF makes several other drinks including Tang, Kool-Aid and Country Time. It expanded its Kool-Aid line in the summer of 1985 with a limited rollout of Kool-Aid Koolers, GF's entry into the aseptic-packaged drink category. The company spent $22.2 million in measured advertising on its Kool-Aid products.

In April, 1985, GF rolled national with sugar-free Tang breakfast drink, spending nearly $6.5 million on tv, couponing and other promotions. Combined ad spending for all Tang products amounted to $12 million in measured media.

Late in the year, GF's Oscar Mayer unit began national distribution of Oscar Mayer Select Slices, sliced meats made from whole meat rather than mixed processed meats. GF spent $14.5 million on its entire line of Oscar Mayer products.

Other products on which GF invested heavily in measured advertising were Jell-O products ($57.4 million), Louis Rich products ($14.5 million), Stove Top stuffing ($10.9 million), Birds Eye Cool Whip ($9 million), Minute Rice ($8.2 million), Birds Eye frozen foods ($7.1 million), Shake 'n Bake ($6.8 million) and Good Seasons salad dressings ($6.2 million).

GF spent $33.8 million on measured advertising in 1985 for its Maxwell House coffee line, which remains the leading coffee brand in the country. Combined with Sanka and several other brands, GF commands a 41% market share.

GF rolled national last year with Maxwell House decaffeinated instant coffee and began testing Maxwell House Master Collection, a family of whole-bean and ground-premium coffees.

It also introduced fresh-lock packaging for the ground-roast regular and decaffeinated varieties of Maxwell House and Master Blend.

GF spent $14.6 million on its Brim coffee line, $19.2 million on Sanka and $17.3 million on General Foods International Coffees.

In a year of record volume and sales in the cold-cereal market, General Foods' Post cereals decreased in market share from 13.3% to 12.4% in sales and from 14.3% to 13.3% in volume. Analysts say GF suffers from a lack of new product introductions for cereals in addition to a share decline for its traditional brands.

GF's leading brand, renamed Post Natural Raisin Bran, barely made it into the top 10 cereals with a 2% market share in dollars and a 2.6% share in volume.

This represents a slight decrease from 1984. A new ad campaign featuring singer John Denver backs the cereal, which has had the preservatives and the sugar coating on the raisins removed. Grey Advertising, New York, handles the $15 million campaign.

GF also spent $22.1 million on Grape Nuts, which commands a 1.8% market share in sales and 2.4% in volume; $17.1 million on Fruit & Fibre, which has 1.7% and 1.6% market shares, and $5.7 million on Super Golden Crisp, with a 1.2% share in dollars and volume.

Among all PM products, its Miller beer line receives the largest amount of advertising support. PM spent $133.5 million on measured advertising in 1985, 16.4% of its total ad expenditures, on Miller advertising and promotions.

The largest share was spent on network tv spots for Miller High Life and Lite beer from Miller, the nation's leading light beer.

Miller Brewing Co. had operating income of $136 million in 1985, a 16.7% increase, on sales that declined by 0.5% to $2.9 billion. Sales for Miller High Life declined last year, leading to the over-all sales drop. Miller also introduced Miller High Life Genuine Draft in 22 states early this year.

Although operating income for PM's Seven-Up Co. increased for the year, sales declined. The lemon-lime soft drink still leads that segment of the soft drink market, but with a market share of only 53.1%, down from 64.1% in 1984, losing to Coca-Cola's Sprite and especially to PepsiCo's Slice.

Measured advertising in 1985 amounted to $15.6 million for Diet Seven-Up and $20.7 million for its regular brand. In July, 1985, the PM subsidiary shifted its Seven-Up account from N W Ayer to Leo Burnett USA, Chicago. The shift was made, according to some sources, because of a disagreement between the client and Ayer over use of the brand's "Uncola" ad theme.

When asked why he robbed banks, Willie Sutton replied: "Because that's where the money is."

Willie was no dope. He knew the secret of business success: Go where the money is. But for advertisers, going "where the money is" doesn't go far enough. They should go "where money works" because people who make money work are better prospects than people who work for money. They earn more, invest more, spend more.

These are the kinds of people who read DOWLINE. It shows them how to make the most of Dow Jones News/Retrieval® and DowPhone,® two services that bring the vast news-gathering resources of Dow Jones to subscribers electronically and by phone. DOWLINE gives influential business people and active investors practical guidance on how to use information to make the right business and investment decisions. No wonder DOWLINE readers have an average household income of $75,000, an investment portfolio of $163,000, and they trade an average of 20 times a year.

Come to think of it, if Willie Sutton had realized how successful our readers are, he might have stopped robbing banks, and started reading DOWLINE. Because DOWLINE is where the money works—and where your advertising should be.

Pillsbury Co., substantially boosting its over-all advertising and promotion budget last year, was fueled by strong sales in the Minneapolis company's food and restaurant divisions.

Worldwide, Pillsbury's advertising and promotion budget, which includes some selling costs, increased 28% to $525 million reported to the SEC during fiscal 1986, which ended May 31. Ad and promotion costs in the U.S. were not disclosed, but were estimated by Advertising Age.

Fiscal 1986 was Pillsbury's 15th straight year of increased sales and earnings. Strong sales increases in the consumer foods and restaurants divisions boosted net income 8% to $208 million from $192 million in 1985, and sales were up 21% to $5.8 billion from $4.8 billion in 1985.

Consumer food sales rose 17% to $3.03 billion, and restaurant sales grew by 30% to $2.66 billion, while sales in Pillsbury's commodities division continued to fall, skidding 18% to $182 million from $223 million in 1985, reflecting a general downward trend in commodities pricing. That decrease mirrors a similar drop between 1984 and 1985.

Measured advertising rose 11.1% during calendar 1985 from $234.0 million to $246.9 million—with $172 million spent advertising Pillsbury's growing flock of restaurants, according to Leading National Advertisers. Including spending by local franchisees, advertising spending on the restaurant division hit $190 million in 1986.

Television by far dominates spending in the restaurant division with spot tv taking $96 million, up 15% from 1984, and network tv $74.8 million, up 35%. Burger King total measured advertising of $156 million was virtually all in television—$83.9 million in spot, up 7.4%, and $71.1 million in network, up 38.6%. Tv spending for Burger King does not include this year's $40 million "Herb" blitz. Godfather's Pizza was supported with $8.7 million, all in spot tv, and Steak & Ale drew $3.2 million in spot, up 33%, and $3.7 million in network, down 9%.

Acquisitions were key last year to Pillsbury's transition from a folksy seller of flour and food ingredients to slick marketer of prepared foods and consumer goods.

After months of rumors, last December Pillsbury bought Jeno's, its frozen pizza rival, based in Casselberry, Fla. The purchase, for an undisclosed sum, gave Pillsbury, already the marketer of No. 1 Totino's pizza, the nation's No. 2 pizza and a 50% slice of the $813 million frozen pizza market.

In other acquisitions, Pillsbury bought R.T. French's dehydrated and fresh potato unit and Peoria, Ill.-based Joan of Arc Co., a canned vegetable and salads business, increasing its canned product line by one-third. In addition, Diversifoods, an Itasca, Ill.-based restaurant holding company, was bought for $386.4 million, marking the largest acquisition in Pillsbury's history.

Diversifoods, bought in May, 1985, delivered to Pillsbury the largest Burger King franchisee in the nation and 1,000 other restaurants, including Godfather's Pizza, Bennigan's, Quik Wok and Steak & Ale restaurants. Two other additions to the restaurant division are Bay Street and Key West Grill, which is testing in Florida, a Pillsbury spokesman says.

Full service restaurants, such as Bennigan's and Steak & Ale, enjoyed a good year as sales climbed 13% in 1986 to $722 million.

In the seven months after the Diversifoods buy, Pillsbury showed its backing for Omaha-based Godfather's Pizza with $8.7 million in measured ad spending, virtually all of it spot tv.

Pillsbury restaurants' sales, including franchise revenue, amounted to $2.66 billion, up 29.7% with an operating profit of $304.7 million, up 38.5%.

The consumer products division includes vegetable and side dishes, prepared dough products, main meals, light meals and snacks, and bakery and sweet goods.

In addition to the acquisition of Jeno's Pizza, a barrage of new products helped Pillsbury maintain its strong market share in half of the company's domestic product categories. Green Giant Valley Combinations frozen vegetables, Haagen-Dazs ice cream bars as well as a new line of Pillsbury microwave and prepared dough products were just some of the division's new entries.

Microwave and toaster products led the meals and snacks division in new product introduction. Pillsbury expanded its microwave line with French Bread Pizza and Classic Casseroles, and toaster muffins debuted this summer in grocery freezers. In addition, Azteca, a new line of Mexican foods, is now being test marketed. Overall, the meals and snacks division, with $562 million in sales, showed a 43% gain in 1986, while the breads and bakery division showed only a slight increase of 2% with $1.21 billion in sales.

Pillsbury dough, the largest product category in the breads and bakery division, added new products to its line—Pillsbury BEST soft, spoonable cookies in four varieties, Crusty French Bread, and All Ready Pizza Crust.

Pillsbury is moving increasingly toward ready-to-eat foods, as is competitor Procter & Gambie, which is deemphasizing standard cake mixes in its Duncan Hines brand as the market demands more easier-to-prepare finger food mixes, such as muffins and brownies, where it is running headlong into the province of General Mills' Betty Crocker line.

Pillsbury announced earlier this year that traditional company products like dry mixes and refrigerated dough, which now make up 52% of annual sales, are expected to account for just 33% of sales in 1990. In other consumer food group divisions, vegetable and side dishes' sales were up 39% in 1986 to $701 million and ice cream sales saw a 14% gain to $157 million.

Two acquisitions in the vegetable and side dishes division, R.T. French's dehydrated and fresh potato unit and Joan of Arc Co., gave the company more visibility in both canned and potato product specialty lines. With these acquisitions, Green Giant increased its canned vegetable volume 13% in fiscal year 1986. New Valley Combinations frozen vegetables and a new entry in the division—Special Additions, which combines vegetables with separately packaged toppings—helped Green Giant increase its frozen volume 7%.

Pillsbury admitted that sales and profits for BK was well below expectations. Burger King, which now holds approximately 17% of the domestic hamburger market, began a new ad effort in June under the theme "This is a Burger King town." Ad spending figures for the effort are not available.

Earlier this year, after the American public digested BK's search for Herb (a mythical fellow who had never been to a Burger King), the fast food marketer introduced Chicken Tenders to the crowded chicken nugget market. But a combination of consumer demand and supply problems, traced in part to McDonald's purchase of every available chicken scrap in the U.S. while Wendy's readied its own chicken product, hampered the March 30 introduction.

Burger King restaurants across the country were running out of Chicken Tenders by late April, forcing BK to stop national advertising for the product until mid-August.

In 1986, competition pushed BK to seek out unconventional locations for its restaurants. Military bases, shopping malls and toll roads offered a new home for the Whopper, as college campuses and recreational areas saw the emergence of BK's Mobile Express. BK rolled out eight mobile fast-food units so far this year and is planning additional units in 1987.

Procter & Gamble Co. strengthened its position as the largest national advertiser in 1985 with U.S. advertising and promotion expenditures of $1.6 billion, including spending for its newly acquired Richardson-Vicks subsidiary.

P&G spent the latter part of fiscal 1986, ended June 30, integrating not only R-V, but a newly acquired G.D. Searle & Co. division into its operations. The $1.55 billion acquisition of Wilton, Conn.-based Vicks brought under the P&G umbrella such well-known brands as Oil of Olay, Clearasil and the Vicks line of cold remedies. R-V earned $72.2 million on sales of $1.2 billion in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1985. P&G got Searle over-the-counter pharmaceutical brands—Metamucil, Dramamine and Icy Hot—from Monsanto Co., St. Louis, in a sell-off following Monsanto's purchase of Searle.

Throughout the 1985-86 fiscal year, P&G's product lines increased sales and market share, but the company says a higher tax rate and interest expense stemming from the acquisitions masked a stronger year-to-year gain in operating earnings.

P&G's acquisition of Vicks enables the company to forge ahead in otc pharmaceuticals with already established brand names. In a letter to shareholders, P&G said the Vicks and Searle purchases make P&G the leading otc pharmaceutical marketer.

"The merger gives P&G exposure in businesses it's been trying to build, such as otc drugs. It gives it an entree into skincare and nutrition and adds products to categories in which Procter is already strong, like haircare," says Jay Freedman, household products analyst with Kidder, Peabody, New York.

With the Vicks acquisition, P&G also gained distribution synergies, with P&G strong in food and mass retail outlets and Vicks strong in drug outlets. "R-V and P&G's combined distribution will be helpful to both companies, particularly overseas [where Vicks is noted for its market coverage]," says Hugh Zurkuhlen, P&G analyst with Salomon Brothers, New York.

P&G alone spent more than $1.09 billion in worldwide advertising and promotion in fiscal 1985, ended June 30, says the company. Vicks in its fiscal 1985, ended June 30, reported its selling, advertising and administrative expenses as $604.2 million, down from $622 million in the prior year. Of that 1985 total, about $400 million was in actual advertising and promotion.

According to seven media measured by Leading National Advertisers, P&G (and R-V) advertising for 1985 totaled $926.5 million, up 9% from a combined $850.3 million in 1984. Both years include full-calendar-year totals for both P&G and R-V.

The P&G-Vicks merger added substantially to the combined company's ad spending and media clout. Vicks helped P&G further its claim as the world's biggest tv spender. In network tv, P&G now spends a hefty $200 million more than No. 2 American Telephone & Telegraph, nearly double AT&T's total spending.

Vicks' $70 million tv budget mainly supports its cold remedies, primarily NyQuil, DayQuil and Vicks Formula 44D. P&G handles network tv negotiations in-house.

P&G in April, 1986, began redistributing product responsibilities for Vicks and Searle brands in an effort to eliminate duplication and to take advantage of different marketing and development strengths.

Vicks continues to operate as a separate subsidiary, with its president and ceo, John S. Scott, reporting to P&G president John Pepper. P&G's beauty care division takes over Vicks' Vidal Sassoon and Pantene haircare products, and its health and personal care unit will handle the Denquel oral care line, Tempo antacid and Searle's Metamucil. Vicks assumes responsibility for Chloraseptic and Head & Chest cold remedies, Norwich aspirin, Encaprin analgesic, Wondra hand-and-body lotion and Searle's Dramamine and Icy Hot.

The merger and the subsequent brand realignment led to agency changes. The biggest move took $45 million in measured media spending for Vick's Oil of Olay and Vicks Formula 44 away from Young & Rubicam, New York. The agency change was expected. P&G has one of the strictest advertising-conflict policies. While Y&R did not hold any conflicting accounts with its Vicks products, it is a major agency for P&G's main competitor, Colgate-Palmolive, which Y&R joined several years ago after dropping its P&G business.

Oil of Olay was given to Wells, Rich, Greene, New York, which handles P&G's Prell, Sure and Spic 'n Span, among other products. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, picked up Vicks Formula 44, an estimated $12 million account, but lost the $16 million Pepto-Bismol and $5 million Tempo accounts to Leo Burnett USA, Chicago. Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, was assigned Metamucil, an $8 million account handled by Needham Harper Worldwide. P&G also removed Encaprin from DFS-Dorland Worldwide and Dramamine from Needham Harper Worldwide, but has not announced new agency assignments. Encaprin has been discontinued due to a lack of sales.

Instead of introducing a slew of new products, P&G went back to marketing basics in 1985, lavishing money and attention to strengthen the market positions of its main businesses—diapers, dentifrice and detergents.

In the $2.8 billion U.S. disposable diaper category, the company began enjoying the results of its $500 million capital expenditure and advertising program to revamp aging equipment and introduce improved Pampers and Luvs disposable diapers. It is estimated that P&G spent as much as $220 million of that amount on advertising and promotion alone. P&G is spending an estimated $100 million on advertising and promotion for the thicker, "Blue Ribbon" Pampers introduced in June, 1985, and thinner Ultra Pampers, introduced early in 1986.

Coupled with an early 1986 launch of new Luvs Baby Pants, a thicker diaper with elasticized waistband and legbands, P&G's share of the category rose to 58.5% by mid-1986 from 46% last year. P&G's main competitor, Neenah, Wis.-based Kimberly-Clark's Huggies, has dropped from a high share of 32% to 25% during the same period, mainly because the company has had to limit its sales of the diaper and hold off on promotions while it changes equipment to make new versions of the Huggies diaper. Paper industry analysts believe K-C will again gain market share once the company reaches full production capabilities.

In measured media spending, P&G spent $17.4 million, down 34% from $26.4 million the previous year, with almost all that amount put into network and spot tv time. P&G also spent $20.9 million in measured media to support Luvs diapers, down 10% from the $23.2 million in measured spending last year. Kimberly-Clark spent $27 million on Huggies, a 9% increase from 1984's $24.8 million in measured spending. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, handles both "Blue Ribbon" and Ultra Pampers; DFS-Dorland Worldwide, New York, is the Luvs agency.

Analysts say the company made up for the declines in measured spending by doing more promotions, including an estimated $500,000 promotion touting Ultra Pampers' acceptance by the National Assn. of Pediatric Nurse Associates & Practitioners.

P&G also pushed for further affirmation of its diaper superiority, filing a patent infringement suit against Kimberly-Clark. In the case, which has not been decided, P&G alleges K-C's Huggies use P&G's "heat recoverable article" patent. In another court case, Weyerhaeuser Co., Tacoma, Wash., was determined to have willfully infringed on P&G's Luvs diaper patent when Weyerhaeuser copied the diaper for a private-label product it sells.

The Always line of feminine protection products, P&G's first entry into the estimated $1.5 billion feminine pad category, continued its strong showing in its second year of national distribution. In early 1986, P&G introduced "Carry and Dispose Pouches" for Always maxi and thin maxi napkins with print ads themed, "Now it's easier than ever to take Always with you." D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, handles Always. The company also expanded the Always line with the introduction of Always Plus—thin supermaxi, supermaxi pad and regular maxi pads with "panty protectors," side panels that fold down around panty edges to protect against leakage.

P&G's estimated $100 million 1984-85 Always introduction netted the brand an initial 18% share, but the brand in mid-1986 has dipped to a 13% to 16% market share. Category leader Johnson & Johnson, New Brunswick, N.J., has an estimated 45% share for Stayfree, Sure & Natural and Assure & Natural, while Kimberly-Clark maintains a 23% to 25% share with Kotex and New Freedom. Lake Success, N.Y.-based Tambrands' Maxi-Thins has a 9% to 10% share.

Always received more than $20 million in measured media spending, up 12.3%, primarily for network tv and magazines.

The company's 1985 measured spending on its other consumer paper products dropped 14.8% to $29.1 million, partly the result of heavy spending on Bounty regular and microwave towels in 1984.

Banner paper towels, a line extension to value-priced Banner toilet tissue, are in limited distribution. Measured media spending for Banner dropped 47% to $4 million. Bounty holds an estimated 18.8% share of the $1.3 billion U.S. paper towel business, with Banner adding an additional 1.2% share. Market leader, Scott Paper Co., Philadelphia, has a 23.1% share with its four brands—Job Squad, Scot Towels, Viva and Waldorf.

P&G continued testing its lanolin-laced Special Touch by Puffs facial tissues, but apparently has not convinced consumers it has that "special touch" to relieve sore noses. Special Touch by Puffs is in test markets in Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin, positioned as the tissue that "Helps take the 'Ow' out of blowing." The premoistened tissue competes against Kimberly-Clark Corp.'s Softique.

In the over-all $1 billion facial tissue category, P&G has pulled ahead of Scott Paper Co. for the No. 2 slot in the category, with an 18% share, according to some analysts. Kimberly-Clark is the undisputed market leader with an estimated 45% to 50% share generated by its Kleenex brands.

P&G supported its regular Puffs tissues with $6.2 million in measured media spending, up 21.8%. The company backed Special Touch with $299,800 from minimal measured spending in 1984. P&G has not said whether it will distribute the tissue nationally.

P&G is the leading marketer nationally of bathroom tissue, holding close to 30% of the $2 billion market. In addition to Charmin, which received close to $6 million in measured media spending, P&G increased its measured media spending for White Cloud by 92%, climbing to $4.8 million because of a Leo Burnett USA-created tv campaign launched July, 1985.

In the $300 million incontinence category, P&G expanded the distribution of Attends adult disposable briefs into drugstore chains nationally. The briefs previously were available only through home healthcare stores and nursing homes. P&G supported Attends with $1.05 million in measured media spending, up from minimal spending in 1984. The company also began testing new Attends undergarments for the ambulatory incontinent, while continuing to offer Trimfit Attends, a smaller version of the Attends pad, through nursing homes. The incontinence market is skewed toward nursing home usage, with P&G holding an estimated 55% share and Kimberly-Clark's Depend, 13%.

P&G also made a strong comeback in the personal care area, primarily by boosting its market share in the $1 billion dentifrice category. After holding 40% of the market during the late 1970s, Crest steadily lost share to Colgate-Palmolive Co.'s Colgate. By last spring, Crest's market share totaled 29.5% to Colgate's 28%.

P&G then rebuffed the Colgate challenge by launching Crest Tartar-Control, backing the new product with an estimated $50 million. It also spent an additional $25 million on Crest pump dispenser and $20 million to $25 million on regular Crest. Market share has returned to its 37% to 39% 1970s level.

In measured media spending, P&G spent $38.3 million for Crest, up 21%.

P&G's cosmetic Gleem toothpaste spending rose 66% to $7.4 million, mainly through spot tv buys. Measured support for Scope mouthwash rose 6.25% to $13.6 million.

In the nearly $1.3 billion (retail sales) deodorant/antiperspirant market, P&G's Secret and Sure held steady market position throughout the year. Secret holds an 11.1% share and Sure, 12.5%. Measured media spending dropped 10.4% to $28.5 million.

P&G continued its introductory cycle for the eight-item Ivory shampoo and conditioner line into the $3 billion haircare category, backed with an estimated $35 million budget, $17.3 million in measured media spending. By mid-1985, Ivory commanded an estimated 6% to 8% of the market, positioned as the line that is "Not fancy, just fabulous."

P&G's category-leading Head & Shoulders dandruff shampoo contributed 9% to the company's over-all 20% share of the category. P&G is testing via Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, two reformulated Head & Shoulders shampoos, one for normal-to-dry hair and one for normal-to-oily hair.

Measured media spending for Pert shampoo dropped 2.1% to $6.2 million, but may get a needed boost if P&G rolls out Pert Plus, a combination shampoo and conditioner testing in Seattle. Leo Burnett USA handles.

Media spending for Prell doubled to $16.9 million on the strength of the introduction of Prell protein-enriched conditioner. Christie Brinkley is the new spokeswoman for Prell shampoo and conditioner "body-building system," appearing in magazine and network tv spots.

P&G backed the Lilt home permanent, shampoo and conditioner line with $13.7 million in measured media spending, more than doubling spending the previous year. The increased magazine and tv spending backed the introduction of Lilt shampoo and conditioner for permed hair.

P&G's haircare products division in Cincinnati now has purview over Vicks' $100 million Sassoon business, the bulk of sales coming from the U.S. Sassoon increased its advertising 15% to $11.1 million as the unit introduced a men's grooming line and women's styling products.

Although Sassoon lost share when new products, like P&G's own Ivory, came on the market, the line maintains a 3.9% to 4% share of the shampoo market, according to figures compiled by Fairfield, N.J.—based Charles Kline & Co., a market consulting company. The unit produced a music video, Mr. Mister's RCA recording "Is It Love," featuring actors wearing the company's new Colorific products, unusual styling mousses and gels that temporarily dye hair in intense punkish colors.

Sassoon supported the new product introduction with a $10 million campaign via Peter Rogers Associates, New York. The line includes shampoo, conditioner, finishing rinse, hair spray and various men's grooming aids.

Pantene, a well-established trademark internationally, used department store promotions to give the upscale brand much-needed visibility. In the U.S., the brand holds an estimated 2% share of the category, according to Kline & Co. The brand received $1.2 million in measured media spending, the same as 1984, mainly in magazines and spot tv.

P&G supported Wondra hand-and-body lotion with $1.9 million in measured media spending, a 51.3% decline. Greenwich, Conn.-based Chesebrough-Pond's Vaseline Intensive Care lotion continued its supremacy in this $500 million category, with a 19% dollar share. Wondra posted a 2% dollar share.

Richardson-Vicks' Oil of Olay remains the clear leader in the $450 million facial lotion segment, with a 23% share, but its sales have slipped, as have No. 2-ranked Noxell's Noxzema, whose share has dropped to 15.6% from a 1979 high of 28%, Salomon Brothers analyst Diana Temple says.

Facial cleansing is one of two growth areas, the other being men's skincare, that Richardson-Vicks has entered in recent years. The Oil of Olay line, which includes the Olay beauty bar and the Olay beauty cleanser, received $27.9 million in measured media spending via Young & Rubicam, but the $100 million brand has since been reassigned to Wells, Rich, Greene.

Clearasil has extended its teen base to the 20-to-34-year-old market, as the teen population in the U.S. has declined. Clearasil adult care acne medicine entered the $140 million-plus, acne-remedy market in 1984 and has been edged out in the battle for market share by Revlon's Oxy 5. Market share for both companies is in the low 20% range. Noxell's Acne 12 continues to trail both Revlon and Clearasil.

Vick's Saxon men's skincare line, made up of an aftershave conditioner and Golden Musk fragrance, received $1.18 million in measured media spending, up 73.5%.

Procter & Gamble increased measured media spending 35% for its bar soaps, to $59.9 million. Ivory bar and liquid soaps dropped 40% to $18.7 million, with Camay, Coast, Lava, Safeguard and Zest reporting spending increases. Media spending for Monchel face and body bar jumped to $3.2 million from minimal media expenditures, as P&G rolled the product into limited national distribution.

Completing the triumvirate of leading P&G business, the company's detergent business came roaring back during 1985, buoyed by new product introductions and further consumer acceptance of Liquid Tide. For one A.C. Nielsen Co. reporting period, Liquid Tide held the No. 1 spot in the $1 billion liquid segment of the detergent category, beating out Lever Bros.' Wisk. However, Wisk in mid-1986 has come back stronger than before, holding a 7.6% share to Liquid Tide's 6.1%.

Although competition from Colgate-Palmolive and Lever Bros. remained high, P&G regained some lost market share, with the flagship Tide brand holding an estimated 23% to 25% share, up from 21% last year. P&G is determined to increase its over-all 50% hold on the $3 billion detergent category and is testing at least five new detergent products, most bearing the Tide name.

In various test markets are: Multi-Action Tide sheets, a detergent, whitener and fabric softener packaged in a single sheet used in both the washer and the dryer; Tide Redi-Paks, 10 single-use boxes of Tide powder packaged together; New Tide, a mixture of color-safe bleach, bleach activator and enzymes, and Liquid Cheer, a liquid version of the popular all-temperature powdered detergent.

P&G also tried Cheer Power Pouches, a premeasured, concentrated detergent packaged in dissolvable pouches. The product is very similar to Clorox Co.'s Act, also a concentrated laundry detergent in premeasured pouches. Oakland, Cal.-based Clorox is testing Act in three southern cities.

P&G also expanded nationally with Liquid Bold 3 heavy-duty laundry detergent supported with $14 million in measured media spending.

P&G spent more than $44 million in measured media on the Tide franchise and backed Era Plus with $17.3 million, up 4.8%.

Much of P&G's detergent problems stemmed from the lackluster performance of its first liquids—Era, Plus and Solo. The introduction of Liquid Tide and the upgrading of detergent formulations are believed to have helped P&G defend its position against aggressive promotions by Lever Bros. for Wisk and new Surf liquid and powder detergents and Colgate-Palmolive for new Liquid Fab and Dynamo 2.

P&G's Cascade automatic dishwashing detergent easily leads the estimated $500 million category with a 50% market share. However, in mid-1986, two liquid automatic dishwasher detergents—Colgate's Palmolive and Economics Laboratories' Electrasol—entered national distribution, and Lever is testing a Liquid Sunlight. P&G is believed to be readying a Liquid Cascade. P&G supported Cascade and Lemon Cascade powders with $15.9 million in measured mdia spending, virtually the same as in 1984.

P&G's Bounce sheet and Downy liquid fabric softener brands continued leading the $550 million category, although the company's combined market share is 48%, down seven percentage points from its year-earlier level. Lever Bros.' Snuggle sheet and liquid fabric softeners have picked up much of P&G's share, holding an estimated 19% of the category. P&G has introduced Triple Concentrated Downy to rebuff Lever's inroads in the fabric softener category and supported Bounce and Downy with $24.4 million in measured media on network and spot tv, down 14.7%.

In light-duty dishwashing liquids, P&G introduced Sud-Z Lemon as the spokesfruit for Joy dishwashing liquid. Joy, courtesy of Sud-Z Lemon, was restaged as "the toughest little squirt on dirt." Grey Advertising, New York, handles Joy.

With its Dawn, Ivory and Joy brands, P&G holds a 45% share in the $750 million light-duty detergent category. The company poured $35.5 million in measured media to back the category, down 14.5%.

In the general household cleaning category, P&G introduced Spic 'n Span no-rinse cleaner, backed with $4.9 million in measured media spending, with an additional $6.8 million supporting Spic 'n Span liquid pine cleaner. Comet cleanser received a 17% boost to $7.5 million, while Mr. Clean cleanser climbed 18% to $8.5 million. Spending is expected to jump sharply during P&G's 1986-87 fiscal year with the national launch of Mr. Clean soft-abrasive cleanser.

P&G's other all-purpose cleaner, Top Job, dropped 13% to $6 million in measured media support.

P&G responded to skyrocketing wholesale coffee prices in March, 1986, with the introduction of Folgers Special Roast flaked coffee. The 11.5-oz. can yields the same amount of brewed coffee as a 1-lb. can, but costs about $1 less. The Special Roast competes against market leader General Foods' Maxwell House Master's Blend in the $4.5 billion coffee market. White Plains, N.Y.-based GF has a 41% market share and Maxwell House is the largest selling brand. P&G has a 22.5% share and Folgers is the second-biggest brand. P&G spent $43.6 million in network tv, spot tv and cable tv for Folgers regular and instant coffees.

P&G in early 1986 also expanded the test of Folgers Red Brick, a ground-roast coffee sold in a brick-shaped package made of laminated plastic and foil, into the northeast from southeastern markets. Brick packs from General Foods and Chock Full O' Nuts Corp., New York, also are in the works.

Measured media spending for High Point coffee dropped 72% to $4.1 million as P&G turned its marketing attention to the better-selling Folgers brand.

P&G continues to lose money on Citrus Hill Select, backed with $15 million in measured spending. It holds an estimated 10% of the $2.4 billion ready-to-serve orange juice category. Coca-Cola Foods, marketer of Minute Maid, claims a 22% share and Beatrice Cos.' Tropicana, 11%. Both Citrus Hill Select and Duncan Hines ready-to-eat cookies continue to perform well-below original company expectations.

During the year, Duncan Hines continued battling No. 1 Nabisco Brands, Frito-Lay and Keebler for market share in the $558 million soft-cookie segment of the $3.1 billion ready-to-eat cookie category.

When the dual-texture segment was introduced three years ago, analysts predicted it would command as much as $775 million or 25% of the market. However, the segment has been flat, despite new packaging, flavors and recipe formulations by all four companies.

Nabisco (now RJR/Nabisco) remains the frontrunner with a 37% market share. P&G has 28.4% of the soft-cookie market and has made a modest formula change in its chocolate chip cookie. The new "Blue Ribbon" recipe—made to be more homemade, the company says—is for the plain chocolate chip, mint chocolate chip and butterscotch chocolate chip varieties.

Ready-to-eat cookies received $22.5 million in measured media spending, up 63%. Some of the media spending supported the launch of Duncan Hines cookies in convenience packs. Four-cookie packs now are sold through vending machines in the Southeast and Midwest.

For cake mixes, P&G holds an estimated 40% share of the more than $756 million mix category with its Duncan Hines brand. The company reportedly is deemphasizing promotions for its standard cake mixes to better concentrate on "finger foods," such as brownie and muffin mixes. P&G in December, 1985, introduced nationally a three-item line of Duncan Hines Bakery Style muffins and a three-item line of Duncan Hines flavored brownies. Measured media spending was $34.6 million for the Duncan Hines mix line, up 28%.

P&G's soft drink business, Crush International, has not progressed beyond a 2% share of the $30 billion soft drink retail market for its Crush, Hires root beer and Sun Drop brands. The company tried keeping up with the rapid-fire spending and new product introductions from PepsiCo and Coca-Cola, both of which launched 10% fruit-juice soda lines, while P&G reformulated its orange, grape and strawberry Crush sodas to also include 10% juice. Cunningham & Walsh, New York, handles P&G's $4.3 million Crush account.

The drug lines of P&G's new purchases, Richardson-Vicks and G.D. Searle & Co.'s Metamucil, Dramamine and Icy Hot, added to P&G's Norwich-Eaton division, gave the company an estimated $1 billion in otc drug sales to push P&G past market leaders Johnson & Johnson and American Home Products, according to estimates by Charles Kline & Co., marketing consultancy.

To its crowded medicine chest, P&G added Vicks' popular line of Formula 44 cold remedies, Cremacoat, Daycare, NyQuil, Sinex, Vaporub and Percogesic analgesic.

According to Hugh Zurkuhlen, analyst with Salomon Brothers, P&G stated its otc intentions with the 1982 purchase of Norwich Eaton. He says the company clearly had a strategy of "growth through acquisitions." Norwich Eaton brought Pepto-Bismol, Norwich aspirin and Chloraseptic to P&G.

In the $800 million cold-remedy market, NyQuil continued as the market leader with an estimated 12% share, followed closely by Burroughs Wellcome's Actifed and Sudafed brands, which together have nearly 20% of the market.

R-V executives attribute NyQuil's continued success to its constant selling message that it is the product for "nighttime colds relief." D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, handles. The company supported Ny-

Quil with $15 million in measured media spending in 1985.

In the $300 million cough segement, Robitussin, marketed by A.H. Robins Co., Richmond, Va., and Vicks Formula 44, remain leaders with a combined 50% market share. Formula 44, originally targeted to children, successfully changed its strategy during 1985 to attract baby-boomer adults via a new campaign and a repositioning of its line. Tv spots that aired durring the winter cough-cold season featured soap opera star Peter Bergman with the theme, "The adult formulas. From Vicks, of course."

The company supports the Vicks line with more than $14.8 million in measured media spending. Young & Rubicam was the agency. The brand has been reassigned to D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York.

Encaprin, P&G's encapsulated aspirin, continued losing ground to the ibuprofens marketed by Bristol-Myers and American Home Products. With $6.3 million in measured media spending, down 66%, Encaprin has managed to earn less than a 1% share of the $1.2 billion U.S. pain reliever market. DFS-Dorland Worldwide, New York, was Encaprin's agency. Currently, the brand is unassigned.

Another struggling brand is P&G's Head & Chest, whose 2% share of the cold remedy category weakened even more during the 1985 cold season.

In April, 1986, John Pepper assumed the title of president, moving up from exec vp-U.S. consumer products, succeeding John Smale, who remains chief executive officer and chairman. Mr. Smale succeeds the retiring Owen Butler as chairman.

Boosted by spending for Richardson-Vicks' products, P&G's spending for eight measured media jumped 9.72% to $926.5 million. Major media spending shifts were in network cable tv, up 25%; magazines, up 43%; network radio, up 131%; newspapers, down 68%, and outdoor, down 60.7%.

In June, 1986, P&G sold Vicks' home care products division, including Formby's furniture stains, Thompson's Water Seal and Tri-Flow, to Sterling Drug Co.

Quaker Oats Co., which boosted its advertising budget 5.1% in 1985, is integrating past acquisitions into the product family and strengthening its leading position in the food industry with further acquisitions.

The company boosted its advertising and marketing expenditures 13% to $716.6 million worldwide in fiscal 1986 to give the Quaker stamp to this new business, and it spent $463.1 million worldwide, up 12%, on merchandising expenses. Quaker's U.S. advertising expenses increased to $246 million in 1985, according to an Advertising Age estimate.

Quaker is structured in four major segments: U.S. grocery, which produces about half of Quaker's total sales and two-thirds of its operating income; international grocery products, about one-third of sales and a fifth of operating income; Fisher-Price toy division, good for 12% of sales and 10% operating income, and specialty retailing group, about 5% each of sales and operating income.

Quaker recently announced its intention to sell off its specialty retailing unit, made up of Brookstone, a hobby tool supplier; Jos. A. Bank Clothiers, and EyeLab, a professional, one-stop eyecare facility.

Quaker continues to focus on acquisitions for its U.S. Foods operations and is particularly interested in foodservice companies, such as Liqui-Dri Foods, chairman and ceo William Smithburg says. In 1985, Quaker bought Liqui-Dri, which supplies biscuit mixes to McDonald's. At the time of the purchase, the company sold into about 45% of McDonald's outlets.

Two deals that are pending would bring San Leandro, Cal.-based Golden Grain and the Gaines Foods unit from Houston-based Anderson, Clayton & Co. into the Quaker Oats fold. The Gaines deal is pending the acquisition of Anderson, Clayton by Bear Stearns Cos. and Gruss & Co., two New York-based investment companies. Anderson, Clayton bought Gaines in 1984 from General Foods.

Golden Grain holds the No. 1 share in the $248 million prepared rice category, according to Time Inc.'s Selling Areas-Marketing Inc. That share could be strengthened further if Quaker takes its two main products, Rice-A-Roni and Noodle-Roni, national. Sources estimated Quaker will pay $250 million for the company. Golden Grain also owns Ghirardelli Chocolates and Vernell Candy Co., which analysts predict Quaker will sell.

The Gaines deal, entangled in the messy takeover battle between Anderson, Clayton and the investment firms, would make Quaker the No. 2 pet food marketer, nearly doubling Quaker's share to 14.5% of the $5.2 billion market. Quaker had been concentrating on expanding its dog food sales with new product introductions and by its entry into the dog treat category.

Last year, Quaker added Puppy Kibbles n' Bits to its dog food line. This June, the company said it will devote $30 million introducing Kibbles n' Bits n' Gravy Bits over the next year, another extension of its highly successful Kibbles n' Bits line. The gravy product is receiving network tv and coupon support via J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

Quaker followed the successful introduction of Ken-L Ration Snausages dog treats with the $6 million introduction of Ken-L Ration Pupperoni's jerky treats for puppies. Quaker is ranked fifth in the $324 million dog snack market.

Ken-L Ration also received promotional support, something Quaker is noted for in the industry. In the Treasure Hunt promo, Quaker gave away $5 million in gold and silver coins inserted randomly in packages of three Ken-L-Ration products. Network tv and coupons supported the drive.

Those and several other product introductions in its U.S. Foods unit typify Quaker's growth strategy. "Brand strength by category, not the over-all size of the company, is the key to maintaining a profitable growth record in the food industry today and in the future," says Frank Morgan, Quaker president-chief operating officer.

Quaker holds the No. 1 position in seven domestic product categories, he adds. They are hot cereals, granola bars, pancake mixes, frozen breakfast products, corn goods, thirst quenchers and canned beans. As of midyear, more than 42% of Quaker food sales came from new products developed or acquired since 1980, Mr. Morgan says.

In January, 1985, Quaker introduced Oh's, a ready-to-eat cereal in crunchy nut and honey graham flavors, into half of the country. The product will move into national distribution this month.

Backed by $27 million in advertising and promotion, Oh's represents Quaker's first new entry into the cereal category since its 1984 introduction of Mr. T. Network tv, print and coupons, via Backer & Spielvogel, Chicago, are supporting Oh's.

Quaker's performance in the $4.7 billion ready-to-eat cereal market has been disappointing over the past several years. The company's share has fallen to 7% in 1986 from 8.2% in 1985. Quaker's strategy is to solidify its base products, Cap'n Crunch and Life, while introducing new products such as Oh's. The "Where's the Cap'n?" promotion for its Cap'n Crunch cereal may go down as one of the best promotions in food marketing. The $18 million promotions involved removing the likeness of Cap'n Horatio Crunch from cereal boxes, then providing clues to his whereabouts on the back of cereal boxes.

Selected consumers who found the Cap'n using the clues were awarded cash prizes. The $6 million media support included a $600,000 two-minute tv spot that aired simultaneously on all three networks one Saturday morning, revealing where the Cap'n was.

For its efforts, the Cap'n Crunch brand team was rewarded with a 50% increase in sales during the 14 weeks of the promotion. Time will tell if sales stay higher than prepromotion levels. B&S, Chicago, and Golin/Harris public relations handled the account in conjunction with Quaker's in-house promotion department.

Quaker is preparing a similar promotion for Life cereal. Beginning this summer, Quaker distributed boxes of Life cereal picturing at least two dozen pre-teens and teens. Consumers are challenged to "Find who's Mikey," the cereal's spokeschild for 15 years, who is now 18 years old. Again, selected consumers will receive cash prizes. Quaker is said to be spending up to $20 million on the promotion, or twice the cereal's 1985 ad budget. BBDO, Chicago, handles Life.

In hot cereals, Quaker last year began testing a Fruit & Cream line in Dallas. The four-item line is based in Quaker's successful peaches & cream and strawberries & cream varieties in its regular hot cereal line. The line, now including blueberries & cream and bananas & cream, is set to move into national distribution this month with $17.5 million in tv and coupon support.

Earlier in the year, Quaker introduced Apples, Raisins & Walnuts flavored instant oatmeal. Last September, the company also added the first flavored long-cooking oatmeal, which is now in national distribution. The line comes in two flavors, Apple, Raisin & Spice and Raisin & Cinnamon. That line will be the recipient of a good portion of the $22.5 million Quaker has set aside to promote its hot oat cereals this fall. Quaker holds the No. 1 spot in the $436 million hot cereal market.

Aunt Jemima introduced the market's first frozen pancakes for the microwave or toaster last year in original, blueberry and buttermilk flavors. Aunt Jemima also added a line of One-Batch baking mixes for muffins and biscuits.

Gatorade added two twists last year. The nation's No. 1 thirst quencher is now available in a four-pack of 16-oz. bottles—designed to make Gatorade more portable and bring it closer to the "point of sweat," Mr. Morgan says. The company added lemonade flavor in April.

Quaker began developing another one of its '85 acquisitions, Arden Organics, an Asheville, N.C.-based rice cakes maker. Quaker put its own name on the product and began distributing it through grocery stores from its original health food store distribution system. The company is plugging $10 million into a tv and print campaign via JWT touting the product as a light alternative to bread.

tary exchange rate, brought Quaker's international unit out of the dumps. By midyear, the unit was 16% ahead on sales with unit volume up 5%.

Lower commodity prices and reduced operating overhead also have served to increase profit margins for Quaker's overseas unit. Especially strong were its franchises in France, Italy and the U.K.

Looking for added toy sales for this year's Christmas season, Fisher-Price held an agency review last year, shifting the $25 million account to JWT, Chicago, and Backer & Spielvogel, New York, from Waring & LaRosa, New York. B&S got the $13 million to $15 million infant and preschool portion of the account, while JWT now handles F-P's Gummi Bears and other new products, including Puffalumps and eletronic games. Earlier this year, F-P announced it is doubling its ad budget to $50 million to support new products.

Fisher-Price continued its diversification into products for older children and parents by introducing 33 toys at midyear. For parents, F-P added a car seat with safety and convenience features and the Travel Tender, a portable, foldup crib. Those join F-P's first two Parent Helpers, a buzzer that alerts parents when toddlers open a door and a musical light dimmer, for children afraid of the dark.

F-P teamed up with Walt Disney Productions in a licensing agreement that allows the company to sell plush toy characters based on Disney's Saturday morning tv program, "Gummi Bears." The line includes 28 items from bears to dragons to cubs.

The toy company also added products to its highly successful audio-visual and Construx plastic construction kit lines for older children, introduced in 1984. For infants and toddlers, F-P introduced four riding toys to counteract KDN Enterprises' Big Wheel's domination of that market. Following the success of its Bubble Mower, a toy lawn mower that blows soap bubbles, F-P added the Magic Vac, a toy vacuum cleaner with pretend dust puffs that fly around inside the carriage.

In July, Quaker restructured its U.S. Foods unit, adding two senior vps under Hedric Rhodes, president of that unit. James Tindall, who had been Fisher-Price vp-general manager, U.S., now handles Quaker's hot and ready-to-eat cereals and its corn goods. Lawrence Hathaway, vp-product management for Quaker's U.S. Foods, now oversees snacks, Aunt Jemima products and Celeste pizza.

Earlier this year, Quaker shifted prime-time network tv buying responsibilities to Backer & Spielvogel, New York, from JWT, Chicago. JWT continued to buy daytime and early morning tv.

Leading the major shifts in media spending at Quaker was network radio, up 438%, magazines, up 25%, and spot tv, up 22%. Outdoor dropped 42% and network tv spending fell 6%.

Ralston Purina Co. stepped up its a spending by 24.4% in 1985 as it move more aggressively into grocery aisl items, such as baked goods and house hold batteries, and away from highl cyclical commodities and restaurants.

Ralston, which attributed 27.1% o its total sales and 13.4% of total ope ating income in 1985 to animal feed bought Eveready Battery Co. in July 1986, from Union Carbide when Eveready contributed more than $ billion in sales and pretax profit o about $120 million.

That acquisition and the divestitur this October of Purina Mills makes th shift toward grocery store items an consumer goods more complete. Sale

If the other Denver daily is promising you better results, they're stretching it.
Before you fall for a story that's long on promises and short on results, take a look at Denver's Rocky Mountain News.
We have the attention of 170,000 more weekday readers than the Post. And nearly 50,000 more readers on Sundays. With five weekday issues, the News reaches more than 1,000,000 people, attaining 57% coverage of the Denver area.
Truth is, our readers are active consumers. More than 400,000 are 25 to 49 years old and 500,000 own their home. These same readers and advertisers placed four and a half million classified ads in the News during 1985.
If you want your advertising dollars to be the only thing stretched, call the Rocky Mountain News, (303) 892-5304.

of Purina Mills, a domestic marketer of livestock and poultry feeds, to BP Nutrition Ltd., a subsidiary of British Petroleum, will bring Ralston $500 million.

Ralston's farm animal feed business in 1985, while higher in sales than Eveready, generated 60% less pretax income, representing a 19% drop from the prior year because of the continued agricultural downturn. Eveready will provide the company with an annual volume increase of about 5%, better than its existing grocery product lines and its agricultural unit.

In 1985, Ralston sold its foodservice division and soybean processing operations. Sara Lee Corp.'s Standard Meats unit, Chicago, snapped up the foodservice division while Minneapolis-based Cargill Inc. bought Ralston's soybean operations, removing Ralston from the commodities market.

In October, 1985, the company sold its restaurant division, Foodmaker Inc., San Diego, in a management buyout. Foodmaker includes 800 Jack-in-the-Box restaurants nationwide and five Monterey Jack facilities in California.

As expected, sales through the first three quarters of fiscal 1986 tumbled 11.9% to $3.91 billion from nine-month 1985 equivalents. But three-quarter profits increased a healthy 50.9% from 1985 to $298 million, almost $32 million more than profits for all of 1985.

The $1.42 billion purchase of Eveready, marketer of Eveready and Energizer household batteries, was nearly three times the $475 million Ralston spent in late 1984 to buy Continental Bakeries from ITT Corp.

Eveready and Dart & Kraft's Duracell batteries between them represent an estimated 90% of the $2.5 billion consumer battery market. Eveready and Energizer brands give the company a 60% share of the U.S. battery market and a 30% share of the worldwide market, Ralston says. Dart & Kraft's Duracell brand holds a 35% share in the U.S. and Rayovac Corp., Madison, Wis., has virtually the remainder.

As a division of Union Carbide, Eveready consumed 44% of that company's measured advertising budget. Its ad expenditures in 1985 were $27.6 million, up 24.3% from 1984.

J. Patrick Mulcahy was named chairman and ceo of Eveready Battery Co. by Ralston, a new position. He had been Ralston's vp-administration and succeeds P.J. Kennedy, who had been president of Carbide's battery business. Mr. Kennedy stays with Eveready as a consultant.

Mr. Mulcahy was involved in the acquisition of Eveready and Continental and divestment of Foodmaker. Ralston in late August picked Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, for the estimated $20 million Energizer account.

Previous agency was William Esty Co., New York, which had handled batteries since 1945. Esty also is losing the Eveready line to Avrett, Free & Ginsberg, New York. Avrett and Esty are being given new products.

Ralston's purchase of Continental Bakeries from ITT in late 1984 and introduction of several breakfast cereals and pet foods powered an 88.3% increase in 1985 grocery division sales to $3.6 billion. The company will add further to that with Wayne, N.J.-based Drakes Bakeries, purchased from Borden this year. Terms were not disclosed. Drake had sales of $125 million in 1985 with such products as Drake's cakes, 10 varieties of cakes similar to Continental's Hostess snack cakes.

The near doubling of grocery division sales was needed to offset lower 1985 sales in the agricultural products, restaurants and diversified businesses divisions. A stagnant farm economy, including low commodity and high feed prices, contributed to a 28.2% skid in agricultural products division sales.

Lower sales in the diversified businesses and restaurants divisions were negated somewhat by the proportionally smaller division sales levels and Ralston's sale of Foodmaker for $450 million in a leveraged buyout.

Ralston's Continental Bakeries is the nation's largest wholesale bakery with fiscal 1985 sales of $1.6 billion. A producer of well-known products—Hostess snack cakes and pies, Wonder, Home Pride and Beefsteak breads—Continental sales elevated the consumer products portion of total Ralston sales to 61%. Consumer products sales made up 78% of Ralson's operating profits.

Best known for its pet foods and cereals, Purina churned out new products but at a scaled-down pace. Its 1984 entry in the $438 million granola bar market, S'Mores Chewy granola bars, maintained its 5% to 6% market share, according to Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney, New York.

In 1986, it introduced Ghostbusters cereal, a presweetened rice-and-corn-based product fashioned after the 1984 movie. MCA Advertising, New York, broke the $11 million Ghostbusters campaign in February with a 30-second tv spot featuring a jingle sung to the movie theme written by Ray Parker Jr. Another licensed character cereal, Nerds, debuted in April.

Ralston maintained its 6.3% share in the over-all cold cereal market for both 1984 and 1985, ranking it fifth behind Kellogg, General Mills, General Foods and Quaker Oats. Ralston's cereal sales shifted toward more branded products and away from generic and bulk brands, of which Ralston had been a major supplier. The company's big push in licensed cereal products has given it more branded cereal sales as well.

Introduced in 1985 were a trio of licensed character cereals—Rainbow Brite, G.I. Joe Action Stars and Cabbage Patch Kids—in addition to Almond Delight cereal and three flavors of Chex snack mix.

There was little action on the pet food circuit at Ralston, which holds a 26.8% share of the $5.4 billion market, down from 27.1% in 1984. Ralston's dog food business declined to a 22.4% share of the $3.4 billion market, compared with a 23.7% share in 1984, according to Furman Selz Mager Dietz & Birney.

Measured magazine advertising rose 38.4%, representing an increase of $6 million, with nearly $2.3 million of that backing magazine spending for Happy Cat moist cat food. Measured network tv spending increased 11.7%. Ralston lost ground in the $2 billion cat food category as its share dropped to 31.6% from 33.1%.

Chicken of the Sea brand pink salmon surfaced in five test-market cities in January, backed by a $7 million campaign created by TBWA, St. Louis. The product is billed as the first canned salmon packed without skin and bones.

Ralston spending rose in all nine measured media in 1985, including a 66% increase in spot tv. The company spent $15 million on units ultimately divested, Jack-in-the-Box and Monterey Jack's restaurants. The account, worth an estimated $23 million, was moved during the year to HCM/Chicago from WRG/West, Los Angeles.

During the year, Ralston lost one of its top executives, Bill Claggett, vp-advertising, who became a partner in a media buying/consulting business.

A change in ownership at Revlon and the sale of assets to pay off debt incurred by its new owner have left the once-diversified Revlon a shadow of its former self.

Now called the Revlon Group after its merger with Pantry Pride, Revlon consists of only the beauty products group and vision care segment of the former company. Gone are the ethical pharmaceutical and diagnostic health services businesses that contributed nearly 45%, or about $1.08 billion, to total sales in 1984.

The company's beauty products segment, still intact and carrying the classic Revlon line and the prestige lines, Ultima II and Princess Marcella Borghese, is expected to grow to $1.2 billion in worldwide sales in 1986, or 9% above 1984 levels, when segment sales were last reported.

That growth will come from an emphasis on new packaging and new products in the segment and perhaps from a continued presence in department stores if the decision by Revlon's new president, Sol Levine, pans out to reestablish Revlon's image by emphasizing Revlon's Institut Jeanne Gatineau treatment line.

Mr. Levine is reversing a decision made before the November, 1985, acquisition to phase out classic Revlon products from department stores.

Pantry Pride, a Fort Lauderdale, Fla.-based operator of supermarkets and retail stores, purchased Revlon for its beauty business, which in 1984 accounted for nearly half of the company's sales and one-third of its operating income. The optical portion of the business accounted for 9.4% of Revlon's sales volume.

Advertising Age estimates over-all sales of Revlon Group to be $2.12 billion, based on contributions of $770 million from Pantry Pride's stores and $1.35 billion from Revlon's beauty and vision care business. The estimate from Revlon assumes an 11% growth for vision care and no growth in beauty products.

Revlon's beauty business has been flat for the past five years, an incentive for its new owners to build the beauty business through acquisition. In early August, 1986, Revlon Group agreed to buy Max Factor, Almay and Halston for $375 million from Beatrice Cos.' International Playtex when the group separated from Beatrice in a $1 billion buyout. Max Factor, a declining brand stateside with about 3% supermarket sales, less than half its share six years ago, has good distribution abroad, which should help Revlon. International sales of the group have been sliding since the early 1980s.

During calendar 1985, Revlon supported its namesake mass-market lines with $35 million in measured media support. Top competitors Schering-Plough's Maybelline and Noxell Corp.'s Cover Girl outspent Revlon with $42 million and $43 million, respectively, in measured media allotment, according to Leading National Advertisers, which monitors ad spending in seven media.

At the end of the first nine months of 1985, Revlon's share of the market amounted to 19.4% in dollars, tying with top-ranking Maybelline and followed closely by Cover Girl with a 17% dollar share. Revlon, however, was outpaced in unit sales by both Maybelline (20.9%) and Cover Girl (17.6%) during the same period, according to Robert W. Kirkpatrick, Jr., senior vp with the investment research company of Duff & Phelps, Chicago.

Revlon gave its largest product support to the eye makeup category. Revlon's mascaras, eye shadows and eyeliner products all mustered about a 4.6% to 4.7% share of supermarket dollars in 1985, according to Diana Temple, analyst with Salomon Brothers. Maybelline led all three categories with a 33.7% share of mascara sales, 39% of the eyeliner category, and 54.2% of the eye shadow segment in supermarket dollar volume. Second-ranking player was Cover Girl in all three categories, and Revlon came in a distant third.

Special Eyes mascara was introduced to the public in February 1986, targeted at the growing sensitivity-conscious women's market. Reformulation and repackaging highlighted Revlon's line of nail enamels under the Creme and Crystalline names in August, 1985. A more dramatic gold and black color scheme replaced the clear bottle with white tips. Revlon holds a 9.7% share of the supermarket sales in nail polish. Top-ranking Cover Girl, with a 28.6% share is followed by Cutex, at 14.2%, and Maybelline ranks third to Revlon's fourth, with an 11.3% share. Supermarket sales account for a much larger portion of Cover Girl's business, 30%, while other mass marketers' supermarket sales account for an average of 15% of total supermarket cosmetics sales volume.

In June, 1986, Revlon relaunched its Natural Wonder cosmetics line, with new packaging, new pricing and new formulations. Natural Wonder line was reassigned from Grey Advertising, New York, to Bozell Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York, which also inherited the classic Revlon line.

Intimate Musk fragrance was introduced in March, 1986, and Charlie Go Lightly, a bath and body line that will compete against the Jean Nate brand, was launched in May. Both the new fragrance and the Charlie extensions are handled by Revlon's in-house agency, the 50th Floor Workshop.

The Charlie line also extended its fragrance offerings as floral, musk and herbal versions of Charlie debuted in October, 1985, under the Charlie Naturals name. The three new fragrances were supported by print advertising from Scali, McCabe, Sloves. The Charlie line received more than $4 million in measured backing last year, with $1 million supporting the Charlie Naturals additions.

Additional fragrance activity occurred at the prestige level as Ultima II last summer unveiled its first new fragrance in seven years, Maroc. Maroc's advertising is handled by 50th Floor Workshop. Ultima II also introduced Pro-Collagen Anti-Aging Complex for face and throat and a creme companion product, Pro-Collagen Anti-Aging Complex for Eyes. Ultima II's color cosmetics scheme for the fall is called Modern Art. Classic Revlon's fall color choices are being promoted as "Wall Street Violets."

Revlon's mass market perfume entry, Scoundrel, received $1.6 million in media backing, compared with $2.5 million in 1984, despite the addition of a line extension, a musk-scented version of Scoundrel, in 1985.

A flurry of activity occurred in the shampoo products area, particularly in the Flex line, while HDR (Hair's Daily Requirement) shampoo, which had been backed by more than $10 million in advertising in 1984, received no media support in 1985. It dropped to a 0.7% market share at the start of last year.

On the other hand, Flex was supported by $5.4 million in advertising, compared with $6.8 million in 1984. Flex introduced its value-priced mousse product in the second quarter of 1985. In the fall, a second mousse product, one with dandruff-control properties, was introduced to the market with promotion targeted to both the women's and men's markets. Flex dandruff-control styling mousse appeared with a companion shampoo product, a new Flex Medicated Anti-dandruff Shampoo. Grey Advertising handles the Flex line.

A third mousse entry came onto the market through Revlon's salon-based Roux division to join a new category, mousses that provide temporary hair coloring. Roux's Fanciful color mousse joined the $150 million-plus mousse category.

Another new Flex entry, a three-product line called Flex Sun and Sport Haircare system, came on the market in March of this year. The brightly packaged Sun and Sport trio includes a shampoo, conditioner and mousse for the outdoor-oriented man or woman and was promoted via tv, print, coupons and sampling. A $5 million promotion in the fall of 1985 teamed Flex with American Motors' Renault autos for a "Flex/Renault Wind in Your Hair" sweepstakes effort from Grey Advertising.

Magazines received more than $23 million of Revlon's advertising dollars, close on the heels of network tv expenditures. Magazines are reported to become an even more significant factor in Revlon's 1986 ad budget.

Over-all, Revlon's media spending declined more than 25% compared with 1984 and is expected to drop even further as big-spending products, like Tums antacid and Oxy 10, passed to Beecham with the sale of Revlon's Norcliff-Thayer unit. In 1984, Tums received more than $7.3 million in media advertising and Oxy 10 got $4.1 million.

With such change going on at Revlon, restructuring of management and personnel cuts are a foregone conclusion. At the top, Ronald O. Perelman, 42, chairman and ceo of Pantry Pride Inc., succeeded Revlon chairman Michel C. Bergerac as chairman and ceo. Mr. Bergerac left Revlon with a so-called "golden parachute" worth a reported $35 million. The 54-year-old former Revlon exec had served as Revlon's chairman for 11 years, during which time Revlon was transformed from a beauty company to a health care concern with diversified businesses totaling $2.4 billion in sales in 1984.

Lawrence Wechsler became the president of the Revlon Beauty Group, after having served as president of Revlon's Group III (prestige products, treatment brands, fine fragrances). He replaces Paul Willard, who left the company. Roy Stephens assumed the presidency of Group III, which was vacated by Mr. Wechsler's promotion. Neil Katz became president of Revlon's Group II (haircare, antiperspirants, skin cleansers), replacing Harvey Schwartz, who retired. Group I contains popularly priced cosmetics, nail enamels and fragrances.

Pantry Pride paid an estimated $2.7 billion for Revlon, including debt interest and other expenses. It was a $750 million company before the takeover. Revlon fought the takeover and took steps to merge with a friendly suitor, Forstmann Little & Co., and sell its beauty unit for $905 million to Adler & Shaykin, a New York investment firm, until a Delaware court nullified the plan. Forstmann received a $20 million reimbursement in return for dropping its claims.

A battle continues in a Delaware court with Adler & Shaykin, which contends Revlon is obligated to honor the contract terms reached with A&S before the takeover.

Without admitting or denying any wrongdoing, Revlon in June settled charges filed by the SEC for its failure to disclose in a timely manner its negotiations with the "white knights" when faced with the Pantry Pride buyout.

It was the beauty business that first attracted Pantry Pride's attention and is the part of the business that the new company hopes to expand. In April, 1986, this commitment to the Revlon name was reiterated when Pantry Pride changed the name to Revlon Group. The next task facing Revlon's new owner was to recoup the debt incurred from the sale.

Divestiture marked the path. Two Revlon units—the Norcliff-Thayer division and Reheis Chemical—were sold for $395 million to Beecham Holdings, London, last December. Beecham reportedly plans to sell Reheis.

Revlon's ethical-drug businesses—USV Pharmaceutical Corp., International Pharmaceuticals, Meloy Laboratories and Armour Pharmaceutical Co., with combined sales expected to reach $1 billion in 1985—were sold to Rorer Group of Fort Washington, Pa., for $690 million.

Technicon Corp., Revlon's diagnostic equipment subsidiary, was sold in the second quarter of this year for $300 million in cash and preferred stock to Cooper Development Co., Palo Alto, Cal. Technicon's subsidiary, Technicon Data Systems Corp., was sold separately in a leveraged buyout to an investor group led by John J. Whitehead and Edwin C. Whitehead, both members of Technicon Data Systems management. The sale of the various subsidiaries has reduced Pantry Pride's debt by more than $1.3 billion.

Last year R.J. Reynolds Industries was the first to set off a round of mega-sized package goods company mergers with the acquisition of Nabisco Brands, East Hanover, N.J., for $4.9 billion in cash, notes and stock. It was the largest non-oil-industry merger in history until General Motors bought Hughes Aircraft for $5 billion.

The merger made RJR the largest American advertiser for several weeks, with total advertising and promotional expenditures exceeding $1 billion—the first time any company had exceeded that mark. It lost its No. 1 spot several weeks later when perennial advertising leader Procter & Gamble acquired Richardson-Vicks and Philip Morris acquired General Foods.

In the meantime, RJR Nabisco has been selling properties that do not meet its growth potential. In 1986, the company sold its Canada Dry and Sunkist soft drink units to Cadbury Schweppes, Kentucky Fried Chicken to PepsiCo and the Del Monte frozen food business to ConAgra.

After the merger, the company, renamed RJR Nabisco, was restructured slightly with RJR's Del Monte Corp. subsidiary coming under Nabisco Brands' management and Nabisco's All Brand Importers falling under RJR's Heublein management.

With the acquisition of Nabisco Brands, RJR's 1985 nontobacco sales slightly exceeded its tobacco sales for the first time. However, the company's earnings from tobacco operations would make up 58% of RJR's earnings if profit figures for Nabisco Brands were included for all of 1985.

Worldwide sales increased in 1985 by 27.9%. Net income from continuing operations increased 18.7% to $1 billion, although actual earnings, also $1 billion, decreased 17.3%. The decline in earnings was traced to the sale of RJR's energy business and transportation operations in 1984.

Measured advertising expenditures for 1985 decreased by $50 million, with most of the decline in newspaper and magazine buys.

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. remained the No. 2 cigaret marketer in the country with a 32% market share, behind leader Philip Morris. This represents a 0.4 share point increase over 1984. Reynolds, Philip Morris and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co. were the only cigaret marketers to post share increases.

Reynolds' combined domestic and international tobacco earnings from continuing operations rose 14% to $1.48 billion on a modest 2.8% sales growth. Operating income from tobacco represents 66% of total earnings from continuing operations while sales from the tobacco unit represented 49% of total sales.

None of Reynolds' major brands, however, scored share increases in 1985, with flagship Winston recording the largest drop in market share of the company's best selling brands. Winston's share of the over-all market dropped from 12% to 11.5%. Reynolds spent $48.5 million in measured advertising for its Winston line, up about 50%, according to seven-media Leading National Advertisers measurements. Winston commanded 7.4% of RJR Nabisco's total ad spending.

Salem, the nation's leading menthol brand, retained an 8.1% share of the market in 1985. Ad spending for Salem was $36 million, up 16%, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Reynolds' other two brands in the nation's top 10, Camel and Vantage, saw modest share decreases to 4.3% and 3.4%, respectively. RJR spent nearly $34 million on Camel, down 8%, and $39 million on Vantage, down 10.6%.

In March, 1985, Reynolds introduced Ritz, a 100mm, low-tar regular and menthol cigaret carrying the Yves St. Laurent logo, in selected test markets around the country. Despite achieving market shares lower than many analysts believed necessary to roll national, Reynolds did so in April, 1986, billing it as the first designer cigaret.

In two of the cigaret's test markets, Reynolds tried selling it at 10¢ more a pack than other brands. However, the premium price was soon dropped.

Leber Katz Partners, New York, handles the new cigaret, which is targeted for fashion-conscious females and carries the YSL logo on packaging and on its filter barrels. RJR spent $2.6 million in measured advertising for the new cigaret.

Reynolds settled a trademark infringement suit filed by the owners of the Ritz Hotel in Paris over the use of the Ritz name before the cigaret rolled national. Terms of the settlement were not disclosed.

In the price value segment of the domestic cigaret market, RJR commands a 24.9% share. Reynold's two leading value brands are Doral and Century.

Doral, the country's first branded cigaret that sells at prices competitive with those of generic brands, attained a 1.3% share of the market in 1985, representing about $195 million in annual sales. Doral is priced about 20¢ a pack less than traditional brands.

Reynolds' other entry into the price-value segment of the domestic market, Century 25's, offers smokers 25 cigarets at the same suggested retail price as traditional 20 packs. The two price-value cigarets give RJR a 24.9% share of that market.

In November, RJR discontinued sales of its chewing tobaccos and six of its minor smoking tobacco products. The brands accounted for less than 1% of company sales.

RJR began initial production at its 2 million-sq.-ft. Tobaccoville, N.C., manufacturing complex in January, 1986. The company hopes the plant will be fully operational in late 1987.

RJR's food and beverage operating income increased 97% to $763 million on sales of $8.5 billion, up 66%. The sharp increase is a result of including Nabisco Brands sales and earnings figures from July 2. Nabisco achieved a 12% increase in earnings from continuing operations in 1985 on sales that increased 2% from 1984.

The food and beverage division has gone through considerable upheaval since the first of the year. In the food sector, the company sold Kentucky Fried Chicken to PepsiCo for $850 million and the frozen food sector of Del Monte to ConAgra. In beverages, RJR Nabisco sold Canada Dry and Sunkist to Cadbury Schweppes for $230 million, leaving the division with Nabisco Brands, much of Del Monte Corp. still intact and Heublein Inc.

As of July, the company had introduced 39 new products since January, 1985—22 in 1985 and 17 in 1986. Among these introductions were Oreo Mint Cremes, Blueberry Newtons, several styles of Almost Home cookies, Nabisco Shredded Wheat 'n Bran and Planters honey roasted nuts.

Combined advertising spending for Nabisco crackers, including Premium Saltines, Ritz and Wheat Thins, amounted to $19.2 million, even with 1984. Spending for Nabisco cookies was $32.7 million, up 17.2%.

In order to increase sales of Almost Home cookies, the leader in the soft-cookie market, Nabisco began airing 30-second network tv spots to promote the cookies, now with new ingredients. Nabisco's Almost Home enjoys about 37% of the sagging $560 million soft-cookie market and about 15% of the total cookie market, but faces stiff competition in soft cookies from Procter & Gamble's Duncan Hines (28% share) and Keebler's Soft Batch (27.6%).

Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, produced the campaign, themed, "So good, you can almost taste the recipe."

In the summer of 1985, Nabisco broke a $25 million campaign to introduce nationally its new Blue Bonnet Butter Blend. The company decided to invest heavily in the new product because of favorable results in three test markets where the product was sold without advertising. Measured spending for Blue Bonnet products in 1985 was $2.1 million and for Fleischmann's products, $7.8 million. Fleischmann's North American yeast and commercial vinegar operations were sold in May, 1986, to Burns, Philp & Co. Ltd. of Sydney, Australia.

Canada Dry made an attempt earlier this year, through new products and a new ad campaign, to compete against the soft drink leaders, Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola. Spending for Canada Dry last year amounted to $12.3 million while spending for Sunkist was $7.2 million. Together, the two accounted for 4.6% of the total soft drink market in 1985, with Sunkist accounting for only 2% of the market's citrus-flavored sector.

Analysts say RJR sold the soft drinks in order to keep with its strategy, developed after its Nabisco acquisition, of selling companies that do not meet its growth plans.

As a result of mergers among leading ad agencies, RJR shifted several of its accounts to other agencies, in some cases dropping agencies that had been with the company for more than 30 years.

RJR pulled accounts worth $96 million from William Esty Co. after that company's parent, Ted Bates Worldwide, merged with Saatchi & Saatchi, which services many of RJR's rivals. Additionally, after the announced creation of the Omnicom Group, involving BBDO International, Doyle Dane Bernbach and Needham Harper Worldwide, RJR shifted several accounts from DDB.

RJR's Salem line, an estimated $50 million account, was moved from Esty to FCB/Leber Katz Partners, which has handled other Reynolds cigarets for some time. Esty also lost Nabisco's Milk Bone and Butcher Bones dog biscuits business to FCB/LKP, an estimated $31.8 million in Nabisco cookie business to DFS-Dorland Worldwide, and Nabisco's Premium Saltines and Ritz crackers business to McCann-Erickson.

After the Omnicom announcement, RJR shifted its estimated $22 million hot and cold cereal and dessert business to FCB/LKP from DDB. DDB also lost RJR's $10 million Blue Bonnet and Fleischmann's margarine accounts to Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago. Needham Harper Worldwide, which is merging with DDB, handles Kraft's Parkay margarine, a major competitor of Blue Bonnet and Fleischmann's. Needham also handles General Mills' Wheaties cereal, which competes with Nabisco's Shredded Wheat.

Additionally, in a move unrelated to the agency mergers, RJR in January shifted an estimated $40 million in network broadcast media buying responsibilities from Young & Rubicam to Ohlmeyer Communications, later creating a new unit called RJR/Nabisco Broadcast, headed by Peter Chrisanthopolous. The shift means RJR now controls all of its $135 million in measured and unmeasured network spending since Reynolds acquired a 50% interest in Ohlmeyer when it bought Nabisco. Having already established an in-house print and outdoor buying unit, Reynolds only uses agency media capabilities for spot broadcast buying, which has remained at Lowe Marschalk.

In spring 1986, Reynolds sold its interest in Ohlmeyer Advertising to Interpublic Group of Cos.' McCann-Erickson.

F. Ross Johnson, president of RJR Nabisco, has been named chief executive succeeding J. Tylee Wilson. Mr. Wilson will continue as chairman until he takes early retirement in 1988.

Sara Lee, which underwent a restructuring this year that reflects the loss of its beverage business and importance of international sales, for the first time in more than a decade reported a drop in revenues in fiscal 1986 although income for the period set a new high.

Cause of the corporate sales drop, were the divestiture of the Shasta Beverage and Idaho Frozen Potato operations coupled with the restructuring of the Popsicle Inc. unit.

The resulting loss in sales were felt largely by the new U.S. Consumer Foods segment (it included international foods as well in 1984) in which sales dropped 7% as operating income plunged 13.4% to $131.4 million. Otherwise, the foods group would have had increases in 1985 because the meat companies and Kitchens of Sara Lee and Chef Pierre had new-product introductions and better market penetration that led to an 8% unit volume gain for meats and 7% for frozen foods.

Combined, the Sara Lee meat companies hold about 5% of the $19 billion U.S. processed meat market. The measured ad spending level for all meat products rose 62% to $15.2 million, reflecting a bevy of new product entries from Hillshire Farms (total spending $6.2 million, up 10%) and Jimmy Dean and Kahn's (total spending $2.8 million and $2.6 million, respectively).

Kitchens of Sara Lee has a 40% share of the U.S. frozen sweet goods market. Kitchens of Sara Lee hiked its ad spending 69% to $9.4 million, primarily to support croissants with $6 million, up 91%, and the launch of Bagel Time supported with $1.03 million, all in spot tv.

The Foodservice segment was held down in performance this year because of the divestiture of 670 Lawson's convenience stores and six regional branches of the PYA/Monarch wholesale food supply company. Sales fell 19% as operating income dropped 6%, to $49.8 million.

Sales of the newly created International Consumer Foods segment rose 26%, primarily because of a weaker dollar and strong sales by Douwe Egberts, the Dutch coffee, tea and tobacco house. Operating income jumped nearly 42%, to $70.4 million.

Results at the Consumer Personal Products segment (Aris gloves, Bali and Canadelle lingerie, Hanes hosiery, L'eggs, Sirena beachwear) also were dampened by a divestiture—the sale of service merchandiser Sav-A-Stop, Jacksonville, Fla., in June, 1985. Sales drop 2%, to $1.4 billion as operating income climbed 17%, to $145 million.

In the Consumer Household Products segment, Kiwi, Electrolux and Fuller Brush helped generate a 16% growth in sales, to $943 million and operating income of $118 million, up more than 22%. Acquisitions during 1985 brought in fine leather products, foodservice operators and distributors, specialty meat producers, a seafood distributor, and a bid by Sara Lee to buy the 85% of Nicholas Kiwi Australasia it does not own.

Sara Lee made several divestitures during the year, including foodservice operations from PYA/Monarch, its sugar beet processor, Idaho Frozen Foods, Sav-A-Stop, and Lawsons Stores. In November, 1985, the company sold Shasta Beverages to National Beverage Corp., Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., for $55 million.

A wealth of new products and reformulations marked 1985 for Sara Lee. Bagel Time frozen bagels in five varieties were introduced in select markets in October and were national by year's end as Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, enjoined consumer to "eat 'em slow" in its radio and tv commercials. Sara Lee spent $1.03 million on its bagels in measured media, a distant second to Kraft's Lenders' $6 million spending. The frozen bagel market is estimated at $90 million, compared to $310 million for fresh bagels. Lenders has 71% of the frozen bagel market and Sara Lee has 21%.

Another new Kitchens of Sara Lee frozen convenience food, Sara Lee Hearty Fruit Muffins in four varieties, two muffins per pack, bowed in June, 1986, and is due nationally this September. Foods in the frozen breakfast category are the fastest growth group now, up 8% in tonnage and 17% in dollars for 1985 compared to 1984.

In the frozen bread and roll category, market shares have changed since 1982 when Kraft's Lenders had 28% of the market to Sara Lee's 1.7%. In 1985 Sara Lee claimed 33% to Lender's 25.8%. The biggest strength of Sara Lee in that market is croissants; its newest entry is pre-sliced versions, out in March, 1986.

Kitchens of Sara Lee moved its retail account from Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, to Chiat/Day, New York.

New offerings for sausages brought them to the market skinless, microwavable, country style and Southern, extra-lean, low-salt, no-sugar, mesquite smoked (regular and beef), fully cooked and in fillings inside old fashioned buttermilk biscuits—these from the host of regional and national specialty meat marketers in Sara Lee.

Popsicle, which competes in the $1.75 billion frozen treats market, rolled out its new and reformulated product line in spring, 1986, including three new flavors, strawberry, raspberry, and wild berry. Other additions are a fudgier, creamier Fudgsicle, a 3½-oz. Big Stick water ice bar, a 2½-oz. Sidewalk Sundae ice cream bar, and a cookie-size Oreo Snackwich. A single stick has replaced the historic Popsicle Twin Stick except in some stores that sell Popsicles individually.

L'eggs Products introduced in 1985 its Sheer Energy Summer Lights, a seasonal entry; Little L'eggs Tights, for girls to 11; Color L'eggs; and Gitano, fashion colored and textured hosiery. L'eggs received measured advertising of $38 million, up 9%, generally running in magazines.

Hanes Hosiery introduced Silk Reflections light support knee highs and silky designs; Isotoner Pantyhose, a full line of spandex sheer pantyhose; and two lines of textured pantyhose, Fitting Pretty and Today's Girl.

From Hanes Printables came Hanes Fleecewear Adult Sweatpants in 17 colors; Hanes Fleecewear Youth Sweatpants in 12 colors; and the Hanes 100% Cotton Pique Sportshirt. And having passed muster with Inspector 12, three new underwear entries are available from Hanes Knitwear. Hanes received $23.1 million in ad backing, down 6% from 1984.

Two new bras, coming to market in May, 1986, are the latest offerings from Bali Co. Pretty Bali is a satin and lace model, and Racerback is a shoulder-hugging bra. The new items helped push Bali spending up 14% to $2.6 million, virtually all in magazines.

Among a list of new items launched by Nicholas Kiwi Ltd's U.S. unit, Kiwi Brands, were two preparations for black consumers, Ambi Cocoa Butter Skin Cream skin softening formula and also skin protectant formula, and for Hispanics, a medicated MIA Skin Cream.

Kiwi also launched BLOO Fresh Evergreen automatic toilet bowl cleaner and Toilet Duck manual toilet bowl cleaner, Kiwi Aerosol Sneaker Shampoo, and Kiwi Classic Gift Kit, a shoe polish kit in a replica of a 1940 Kiwi Polish can. Kiwi now has 80% of the U.S. shoe care market.

Schering-Plough Corp. suffered a slight drop in worldwide consumer product sales in 1985 because of a decline in analgesic and cold products sales and a low growth rate in the Maybelline cosmetics line. Consumer products, the advertising-driven segment representing 19% of total sales, off from 20% in 1984, grew 3% in U.S. sales.

Schering-Plough got strong gains from its major breadwinner, pharmaceutical products, which includes prescription drugs, over-the-counter medicines, vision care and animal health products. Pharmaceuticals accounted for 64% of operating income, up from 63% in 1984, with consumer products accounting for the remainder.

The company's flat performance — 2.8% growth in sales and 8.7% growth in net income in 1985—began to show improvement in the first half of fiscal 1986 when sales increased 14% to $1.2 billion and net income rose 26% to $143.6 million, aided by strong increases in the worldwide pharmaceuticals business and in the U.S. suncare sector.

Earnings in 1986 could advance 15% to 20%, Value Line analyst Rudolph C. Carryl says.

In the mass-market cosmetics business, Schering's lead product, Maybelline, led the category last year in unit sales, with a 20.9% share of the market, but tied with Revlon at a 19.4% share of the dollars in that segment.

Maybelline, which has the widest distribution in the U.S. mass market with more than 150,000 outlets, sold 170 million units.

At the same time, Revlon held a 16.1% share of the unit sales, and Noxell's Cover Girl line rounded out the top-selling trio with a 17% share of dollars and a 17.6% share of units sold, according to Robert W. Kirkpatrick Jr., senior vp with Duff & Phelps, Chicago, an investment research company. He bases his figures on the first nine months of 1985.

Maybelline defended its dominant market position by increasing its advertising and promotion budget, redesigning product packaging and introducing line extensions. The Maybelline line received nearly $42 million in measured media support, up 24% from 1984. Spending levels are higher in 1986.

Sales of its Expert and Long Wearing brands continued to grow. The Expert line added Expert Eyes waterproof mascaras and a line of Expert lipsticks. The Shine Free line, which is targeted to younger women with oily skin, introduced a line of mascaras in water-removable formulations.

Shine Free received only $600,500 in measured media support. Maybelline's Moisture Whip line, which addresses an aging women's market, received nearly $10.5 million in measured media backing. A new product, Blooming Colors eye coloring pencils, reached market last year. The Daydreams fragrance line, which entered the market with a bang several years ago, received only token support last year and quietly was taken off the market.

Schering-Plough's suncare lines continued to bask in the warmth of a 35%-plus share of market last year, although down from about 40% three years ago. The three suncare lines, Coppertone, Shade and Tropical Blend, meet the gamut of skin tones from deep tanners (Tropical Blend), to burners (Shade) to the in-between (repackaged and reformulated Coppertone). All are waterproof.

The sun products now are enhanced with natural moisturizers, Vitamin E and aloe. Solarcaine aloe vera gel became the No. 1 aloe remedy in the market.

Two tan accelerators also were launched under the Coppertone and Tropical Blend brand names. A new line of suntan products under the La Solaire logo also was introduced, sporting black packaging with gold embossing.

According to company officials,

Drug 'patch' technology

With its recent buyout of Key Pharmaceuticals, Schering-Plough got several new drugs that are administered by a medicated patch put on the patient's skin. Called the transdermal system, the sustained release method may be applied to other S-P products.

THIS BUSINESS EXECUTIVE

• is in top management in his company • has a median household income of $75,280 and a median net worth of $349,000 • influences the purchase or lease of business products and services from accounting to telecommunications • and there's a 50/50 chance he doesn't read any national business publications.

Coppertone advertising in 1986 will be backed by the largest advertising program for that brand to date. Last year's measured media support totaled $6 million, up 36% for the Coppertone suncare product line. A new Coppertone campaign features TANercise, a national promotion that associates aerobic exercise with Coppertone.

Two extensions to the Di-Gel antacid product line were launched in March via a $3 million network radio and print campaign from Bloom Agency, Dallas. They are low sodium Di-Gel liquid and Advanced Formula Di-Gel tablets with calcium.

Correctol introduced a natural grain and fruit fiber powder laxative formulation, which extended the brand's line from just tablet and liquid forms. The mid-November network tv and print campaign from Warwick Advertising, New York, included the printing of 96 million coupons in free-standing newspaper inserts. Correctol laxative is Schering-Plough's largest proprietary drug franchise, and fiber powder laxatives are the fastest-growing segment of the laxative market. The Correctol line received close to $6 million in measured media backing, up 15%.

In December, 1985, Schering-Plough launched Fibre Trim into the $250 million and growing U.S. diet and weight control market. Fibre Trim, an all-natural, high-fiber supplement designed to aid in weight loss, contains citrus fruit and bran fiber. Fibre Trim tablets, obtained under an exclusive license from Danish company Farma Food, achieved $18 million in sales during the first quarter of 1986, according to Mr. Kirkpatrick of Duff & Phelps. If that momentum continues, Fibre Trim sales could reach $60 million by the end of the product's first year, he adds. Fibre Trim is one of the leading weight loss products abroad.

Backed by a $25 million advertising and promotional campaign from Ogilvy & Mather, New York, Fibre Trim already commands an estimated 20%-plus share of the diet market. However, as analyst Adele Haley of Smith Barney Harris Upham & Co. says, because of its unique, all-natural formulation, Fibre Trim had no competitive barrier upon entering the category and its staying power remains to be seen. Still, Value Line analyst Mr. Carryl expects Fibre Trim to "make a modest profit contribution in its first full year on the market—an unusual feat for a consumer product."

The Dr. Scholl's line received more than $8 million in measured media support, up from $4.8 million in 1984.

Sales for the worldwide Scholl footcare line rose by 11% last year, while Dr. Scholl sales in the U.S. showed only a moderate increase. In June, 1986, Dr. Scholl introduced the Smooth Touch foot-grooming regimen. Backed by a $2.5 million network and spot tv ad campaign from Ted Bates Advertising/New York, the seven-item line includes a foot bath, conditioning lotion and pedicure kit.

Dr. Scholl's Legatrin capsules containing quinine sulfate—a muscle relaxant—entered the market in 1985 as a remedy to help relieve night leg cramps. The Dr. Scholl product received backing of $1.6 million in measured media. Schering-Plough is sponsoring national dance competitions to support the "Dr. Scholl's makes you feel like dancing" campaign theme.

The company merged its Dr. Scholl and Plough Inc. personal care units in October, 1985, to provide better customer service, the company says. Plough handled products such as Coppertone, Correctol, St. Joseph's aspirin and Paas. The merger was renamed the Personal Care Group with Michael A. Pietrangelo as president. He formerly was senior vp-consumer operations, headquarters.

In the pharmaceuticals segment, Schering-Plough worldwide sales grew 6% over 1984 as U.S. pharmaceuticals advanced 9%, led by Normodyne, an antihypertensive; Diprolene, a topical steroid; Lotrisone, an antifungal, and Proventil, an asthma product.

Schering-Plough advertises its pharmaceuticals to the U.S. trade through journal advertising, direct mail advertising and distribution of samples to physicians on request.

Schering-Plough's nonprescription drugs, which accounted for 4% of the $8.1 billion nonprescription drug business in the U.S., include such remedies as Drixoral cold tablets, Afrin nasal decongestants, Chlor-Trimeton allergy tablets and the Tinactin line of antifungal products. These otc pharmaceutical sales rose slightly, accounting for more than 35% of Schering-Plough's U.S. pharmaceuticals business.

Drixoral, a cold remedy that has been on the market since 1982, has grown from a 5% to an 8% share of the national market through coupon inserts and without benefit of consumer advertising. There are reports that Drixoral may extend its promotion to include advertising, though company officials declined to comment.

Wesley-Jessen, the Chicago-based vision care products arm, became a consumer advertiser for the first time in 1985. Wesley-Jessen, which recorded sales growth of 21% despite industrywide price reductions, spent about $3 million on spot tv, network radio and major women's magazines.

Pending Food & Drug Administration approval, Wesley-Jessen plans to launch two new products by yearend. The largest planned, the only one to be be backed by consumer advertising, is the DuraSoft Colors line of contact lenses, which involves a patented process in which an opaque color on the lens masks the actual eye color.

DuraSoft Colors was expected to reach the market with a multi-million-dollar ad and promotional budget in the fourth quarter following FDA approval. By the fourth quarter, Wesley-Jessen water-content contact lens, DuraSoft IV, which is less prone to protein buildup than typical lenses.

Schering-Plough's commitment to its pharmaceutical business was reemphasized June 26, 1986, when it bought Key Pharmaceuticals, Miami, for more than $830 million in stock. Key, with 1985 sales of $152.1 million, gives the company a larger presence in the antiasthma, allergy and cardiovascular markets. Key is known for its controlled-release dosage technology.

Key will retain its manufacturing facilities in Florida and Puerto Rico, while the marketing and sales forces will transfer to Schering-Plough's pharmaceutical headquarters in Kenilworth, N.J.

Schering-Plough's cancer-treatment drug, interferon, which has received more than $100 million in research-related funding from the company since 1980, got U.S. approval. Intron-A, its alpha-2 interferon, was approved for treatment of hairy cell leukemia. Approval for five other indications—from venereal warts to the common cold—still is pending. The company also plans to file for a chronic hepatitis B usage.

The Paas line of children's activity products, available for Easter and Halloween, was joined by Valentine gift card kits, marketed for the first time in February, 1986. The Paas line also was extended to the adult market with the launch of Showtime party makeup kits.

On Jan. 1, 1986, Richard J. Kogan became president and chief operating officer at Schering-Plough. He had been exec vp-pharmaceutical operations. Harold R. Hiser Jr., became exec vp-finance, after serving as senior vp-finance, and Donald R. Conklin, formerly president of Schering—U.S., became group vp of pharmaceutical operations. Ralph W. Golby became senior vp-investor relations after serving as vp-investor relations.

Joseph E. Seagram & Sons muscled into the U.S. markets for wine and spirits coolers in June, 1986, hoping to bolster its sluggish domestic sales in its over-all liquor business.

Seagram & Sons is the subsidiary of Seagram Co. Ltd., Montreal, the world's largest producer and distributor of distilled spirits and wines, Seagram Ltd. reported worldwide spending for advertising and sales promotion in 1985 of $312.1 million, up 12.5%.

Seagram & Sons biggest category of spending in 1985 was for Seagram Premium Wine Coolers—a citrus-flavored product introduced in November, 1984—with $12.8 million in measured media, divided 83% network tv, 15% spot tv, and 2% cable. In June, 1986, the company launched Seagram's Golden Wine Cooler, a product targeted at the 27-49 age group with a more pronounced wine flavor, backing it with an estimated $20 million network tv campaign starring Bruce Willis, of ABC's hit show "Moonlighting." Seagram's also added in June, 1986, a new flavor to the original citrus cooler called Seagram's Natural Peach Wine Cooler. The company is budgeting a separate $10 million for the citrus and peach products, industry sources say.

Seagram's also launched a line of spirit-based coolers in June, 1986, called Seagram's Golden Spirits. The line's four flavors include Mandarin Vodka, Peach Melba Rum, Spiced Canadian (whisky), and Sunfruit Gin. Each product contains 5.1% alcohol, the same amount as is contained in wine coolers. The spirit cooler line currently has 40% U.S. distribution in 10 markets. The spirits line is being promoted as year-round drink, unlike winecoolers, which so far tend to best during the spring and sumn "It's more masculine in appeal an little less beachy," a Seagram spo man says. "The whole notion is thi is not seasonal."

Since California Cooler pionee the wine cooler category in 1981 market for coolers has blossomed about $800 million retail in 1985 is projected to approach $1.4 billio 1986, according to Impact, a N York-based trade journal for the w and spirits industry. California Coo sold to Brown-Forman, is now No falling only this year to No. 1 Bartle Jaymes, an E&J Gallo Winery prod introduced in early 1985. Gallo s ports the Bartles & Jaymes bra heavily, spending a measured $1 million in measured media dur 1985, 77% of which was for netw tv. There are more than 100 cool type products currently on the mark

But there is plenty of room growth in the market for coolers of types—wine, spirit and malt. An e mated 72.4 million, 9-liter cases will sold in 1986, up from 42.9 milli cases in 1985, according to Impact. this, Impact estimates that Bartles Jaymes will capture a 22% case sh in 1986, up from 17.5%; Califor Cooler, 18%, down from 26.8%; C andaigua Wine Co.'s Sun Count 13%, up from 11.7%; and Seagra Golden, 6.9%, with 1986 sales o million cases. Seagram's Premium contribute another 4 million case s and Seagram's spirit-based drinks other 750,000 cases in 1986, giving company a combined brand estim of 13.5% share, says Frank Walte director of research at Impact.

A consequence of the rising popul ity of wine coolers, however, is a clining market for table wines, Walters says. Sales of Gallo, the No brand of table wine with an 11. market share, totaled 18.4 million, liter cases, a drop of 6.1% in 1985, cording to the "American Wine M ket Review and Forecast 1986," p lished by M. Shanken Communi tions, New York, also publisher of pact. Carlo Rossi, No. 2 with a 10. market share, fell 2.8% in cases; No Riuniti with 6.4% share, fell 8.8% cases; Almaden, No. 4 with a 5. share, fell 10.8% in cases; No. 5 Ing nook with a 5.1% share fell 2.4% cases. Seagram's Taylor Californ Cellars, No. 6 with 3.9% share, fell in cases, and Paul Masson brand, 7 at 3.8% share, fell 14.1% in cases.

As sales fell, Seagram began shift ad spending away from the two w brands. Measured media for Tay California Cellars dropped 39% to million, divided primarily betwe network tv and spot tv, and fell 59% $2.6 million for Paul Mason. "Seagr sees the shift in the market and they re-allocating advertising dollars wine coolers," Mr. Walters says.

Operating income for spirits a wine for Seagram Co. Ltd. in the y ending Jan. 31, 1986 fell 12.6% a 12.8%, respectively, to a combi $214.6 million on revenues of $2 billion, up 5%. After tax income $99.2 million, down 13%. Adding S gram Co.'s other income from 22.5% stake in E.I du Pont de N mours and Co. boosts net earnings fiscal 1986 to $319.1 million, do 17%. Contributing to Seagram's fall profits was a 19% increase in fede excise taxes (FET) for all spirits Oct. 1, 1985, that prompted consum to stock up early and slack off spe ing at the close of 1985 and at the set of 1986, Mr. Walters says.

Compounding the problem is a d ades-long shift in consumer tas away from harder spirits, such whisky and bourbon, toward ligh sweeter drinks, such as flavor Schnapps, cordials and liqueurs. D tilled spirits consumption slid fr 164.6 million cases in 1981 to 15 million in 1985, according to "J son's Liquor Handbook 1986," N York.

In addition to its new product of ings, Seagram pursued a strategy 1986 of emphasizing its array of p mium products, which a compa spokesman says attract today's brand-conscious, discriminating consumers. An example was $4.8 million in measured media for Chivas Regal, Seagram's premium brand of scotch whisky, up 16%. Chivas, however, with case sales of 845,000 in 1985, unchanged from 1984, is far from being the leader of its category. Schenley's Dewar's White Label brand dominates the category with 2.4 million case sales in 1985, up 7%. Scotch consumption over-all was off 5.4% in 1985, according to "Jobson's."

Spending for another premium product, Seagram's Crown Royal Canadian whisky jumped 18% to $5.8 million. Seagram also increased measured spending 12% on Seagram's V.O. Canadian whisky to $6.7 million. In the Canadian whisky category, Seagram is locked into a battle against lower-priced competitors. Brown-Forman, which markets the No. 1 brand, Canadian Mist, leads with 1985 sales of 3.6 million cases, down 5.5%, according to Steve L. Barsby Associates. National Distillers' Windsor Supreme brand ranks No. 2 with 3.2 million cases, down 1.6%, and Seagram's V.O. ranks No. 3 with sales of 3 million cases, down 5.5%. Seagram's Crown Royal is No. 7 with 1.2 million cases, down 4%.

For the first time in several years, Canadian whisky's share of sales for the total distilled spirits industry fell, dropping to 13.2% from 13.6% in 1984, according to "Jobson's." Canadian whisky volume over-all fell 4.5% on sales of 20.2 million cases.

Seagram dominates the category of blended whisky, controlling the top three brands: No. 1 Seagram's 7-Crown, with case sales down 2%; No. 2 Kessler, with cases sales down 1%, and No. 3 Calvert Extra, with case sales of 914,000, down 8%. Sales volume for blends was off 5.7% on 11.2 million cases in 1985, and blends' share all distilled spirits sales dropped to 7.3%, its lowest point in history, "Jobson's" reports. In 1970, blends accounted for 19.6% of all distilled spirits sales.

Despite trouble in the blended whisky category, Seagram 7-Crown continues to rank as one of the top selling brands of all distilled spirits. In 1985, 7-Crown was the third leading seller behind Smirnoff vodka and Bacardi rum. Measured ad spending for 7-Crown fell 19% to $5.2 million.

Seagram also initiated an innovative and controversial ad campaign in 1985 equating the alcoholic content of a 12-oz. serving of beer, a 5.-oz. glass of wine and a 1 1/4-oz. serving of an 80-proof spirit-based drink. The campaign was designed to overcome consumer misconceptions on the facts of alcohol equivalency. But the campaign also signaled Seagram's new aggressive stance in fighting for the rights of distillers to compete on an equal basis with the makers of other types of alcoholic beverages.

In other action, Seagram in October 1985 cut back to three on its former roster of seven advertising agencies. The consolidation follows a major marketing reorganization that moved various liquor brands into different marketing units. One such move had all of the brands carrying the Seagram name being put together, assigning them to Ogilvy & Mather. Billings are estimated at $40-plus million a year in addition to O&M's current Seagram's accounts.

Another unit set up in February 1985 handles the $20-plus million premium-priced goods, which were assigned to Doyle Dane Bernbach. DDB already was handling Chivas Regal. Mingo-Jones will handle all ethnic advertising.

The big lo[ss] Warwick Advertising, a Seag[ram] agency for 50 years, William Est[ill], Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, and North Castle Partners. Seagram also formed an in-house media buying unit for magazines, newspapers and outdoor called House of Seagram Media. The unit is buying media for House of Seagram, which markets all of the company's distilled spirits brands and its more popular wine brands, and for Seagram Vintners, which markets higher quality imported and domestic wine brands.

Broadcast media are still the responsibility of the agency of record.

Supervising the internal restructure was Peter Dimsey, executive vp-marketing since April 1985, and a former general manager for the Detroit office of Kenyon & Eckhardt.

A Premium Spot That The Others Don't Offer

When you advertise in the PennySaver, we make sure that your ad is delivered. Because we use the U.S. Postal Service. That means it's a guaranteed delivery. Every week. To the market of your choice. Most other publications don't use the same system.

But the PennySaver reaches nearly 7 million Southern Californians. In 186 zones. All with 98% saturation and penetration. And 76% of those 7 million people read the PennySaver each week.

And you'll find that subscription orders are down. In the Los Angeles market, only 45% of readers take the major daily newspapers. That's a substantial waste of your advertising dollar.

So the best place to advertise in the Los Angeles market is in the PennySaver. Because we guarantee you the best spot in town to reach your customers. And to bring you more business.

Sears, Roebuck & Co. hopes further expansion of its financial services business, as well as upgrading of its retail stores, will improve future earnings growth as the company enters its second century of business.

So far, however, the national rollout of Chicago-based Sears' Discover credit and financial services card has dampened earnings in 1986, with a full-year Discover loss anticipated by the company.

The nation's largest retailer—and its No. 4 ad spender—decreased its U.S. ad budget in 1985, to an estimated $800 million from a revised $913.7 million in 1984. (The figure does not include the cost of producing its catalogs.)

The budget includes some $500 million spent on local run-of-press and preprint newspaper advertising.

Worldwide, Sears spent $975.3 million, up 5.4% from $925.1 million in 1984, according to the company. Sears indicated the worldwide figure excluded catalog costs, and the company broke down the figure into $500 million for the merchandise group's newspaper budget and $250 million for the merchandise group's broadcast budget. Of the remaining $225 million, Allstate accounts for $30 million; Coldwell Banker, $11 million; Dean Witter, about $8 million, and minor 1985 contributions for Discover and international.

The company would not further identify the breakout. Often overhead expenses such as salaries, office costs, rent and travel are included in such published figures.

Sears in 1985 changed its media strategy somewhat, reducing upfront network tv buys 29%, while sharply increasing magazine spending. Spot tv spending also was down 82%, to $5.9 million.

Sears continues to be among the largest network radio advertisers and has continued its historic dependence on newspaper inserts and display ads as evidenced by the $500 newspaper budget.

Sears' 1985 returns—an increase of 4.9% in revenues and a decline of 10.4% in income—are attributed to what Sears chairman Edward Brennan termed "the most competitive environment in retailing history." A weaker economy and increased competition has hurt Sears so far this year. In the half ended June 30, net income dropped 1.8%, to $480.2 million, although revenues increased 8.3%, to $20.14 billion. Net income declines also were blamed on costly startup investments in Discover, for which Sears expects to post a 1986 aftertax loss of $115 million.

Sears serves more than 40 million customers with one or more of its five operating units. The largest, Chicago-based Sears Merchandise Group, operates 799 retail stores, as well as catalog sales outlets and specialty paint/hardware, appliance and computer stores.

Other units are the Allstate Insurance Group, Northbrook, Ill., a property-casualty, life and commercial insurer; Coldwell Banker Real Estate Group, Los Angeles, a nationwide real estate company; Dean Witter Financial Services Group, New York, a stock brokerage and consumer deposit and lending operation that also administers the Discover Card, and Sears World Trade, a Chicago-based import-export consultancy.

The merchandise group's retail, credit and international operations in 1985 represented 65.2% of Sears' total revenues and 58.8% of its net income. Division revenue growth in 1985 was up only 0.16% from 1984, while net income suffered a 15.4% decline. Flat retail sales and lower gross margins were among conditions primarily in the merchandising side of the group that led to the decline in net income. The credit and international sides showed gains in net income. For the first six months of 1986, the merchandise unit reported net income of $208.3 million, a 2.8% drop, on revenues of $11.99 billion, up 1%.

The group in 1985 also accounted for most of the $219.2 million in measured media spending. Newspaper display ads and inserts are not included in that total, but the company said it spends an additional $500 million on such advertising.

The sluggish sales climate has made retailing even more competitive. Sears has been pummeled by assaults from specialty stores as well as off-price discounters. In an effort to upgrade its image, the company continues expansion of its "Stores of the Future" concept, in which units are remodeled and updated to give them a more contemporary look. Sears at yearend 1985 had 206 such remodeled stores and expects to revamp 79 more units in 1986. Analysts have said anticipated sales gains in the remodeled units have proved disappointing, although the company says it is pleased with the program.

Separately, Sears this year plans a more rapid expansion of two smaller "Stores of the Future" concepts, in which certain units in small and medium-sized markets are remodeled to handle merchandise tailored to that market's needs. It opened one store last year in Piqua, O., a 40,000-sq.-ft. prototype store for markets with populations of 75,000 to 100,000, and plans 10 more this year.

The smaller 10,000-sq.-ft. stores, serving communities of 25,000 to 50,000 with mainly hard goods, were tested in four locations last year; Sears plans 50 more conversions during 1986. A Sears spokesman says these smaller-scale conversions were "exceeding expectations."

Sears has maintained its franchise in the automotive, hardware, tools and appliance categories with proprietary brands such as DieHard, Craftsman and Kenmore, and execs there say a key strategy is to rely more heavily on branded products unavailable at other retail stores.

The apparel business, however, has been more difficult. The company suffers from its image as a blue-collar clothier. Clothing and other soft goods reportedly account for one-third of merchandise group sales—a figure Sears would not confirm.

In response, Sears has placed a greater marketing emphasis on women and has increased its inventory of both private-label, lower-priced clothing to avoid direct competition with mainline department stores. It also has split apparel buying and marketing functions into two separate areas, women's clothing/shoes and men's/children's clothing.

The company will spend more than $5 million annually promoting a new Stefanie Powers clothing line, endorsed by the actress, in ads from Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, agency for soft goods.

Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, handles Sears' hard lines, as well as its Business Systems computer-store unit. Both agencies continue to use ads themed "There's more for your life at Sears" and have added a special logo commemorating the company's centennial anniversary.

Sears this year hired O&M Promotions as its first sales promotion agency of record. It continues to retain Vince Cullers Advertising, Chicago, and J. Walter Thompson Co.'s Hispania Advertising, New York, for black and Hispanic advertising, respectively.

As of December, 1985, Sears operated 390 full-line retail stores, 355 medium-sized stores and 54 outlets selling exclusively hard goods such as hardware and appliances. In addition to those locations, the company has diversified with in-store and stand-alone retail concepts.

Sears had 103 of its Business Systems computer retail centers operating in 34 states at yearend, and downturns in the "highly volatile" industry have stalled expansion plans for the chain, which originally had planned to add five units in 1986. Advertising via O&M has been restricted mainly to newspapers, with minimal outdoor support.

The company is moving more aggressively in the paint and hardware markets, long the mainstay of its regular retail stores. Sears Paint and Hardware Centers had just 11 units at yearend 1985 in California, Illinois and the New York area but plans 50 more outlets this year in six markets: Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, Denver, New Orleans and Washington. No agency has been assigned to the Paint/Hardware Center account, which uses print advertising created in-house.

In addition to 109 company-owned surplus stores, Sears also franchises in-store dental and optical departments at many locations. As of July 31, 1986, franchised dental centers operated in 65 Sears stores, with 15 to 20 more locations pending, while more than 500 optical centers are located in nearly every major market.

At each of its varied retail locations, 62% of 1985 merchandise sales on average were charged on Sears credit cards, compared with 58.9% in 1983. That increased reliance on credit may help Sears improve its ability to cross-sell financial services and investments.

Sears' marketing of its diversified army of financial services has evolved from an emphasis on convenience of locations within Sears stores to a strategy based on promoting the separate units—separately or jointly—as stand-alone entities. The Sears Financial Network, an umbrella organization for Allstate, Coldwell Banker and Dean Witter, was created to promote the units as "members of the Sears family of companies" in ads from Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago.

The unit spent $5.5 million in measured media during 1985, way down from $15.4 million in 1984, and this year began sharing split-30 tv spots with each of its three members. The financial network in 1985 eliminated magazine advertising, measured at $2.5 million in 1984; cut network tv in half to $4.5 million, and sliced spot tv from $3.4 million to $742,500, according to Leading National Advertisers. In coming months, Sears plans to scale back its role as a marketing umbrella, giving each of its members primary responsibility for promoting the affiliation with Sears.

Separately, the company in April formed a new Sears Home Mortgage subsidiary, combining mortgage lending and insurance operations of Allstate, Coldwell Banker and Sears Savings Bank in California with mortgage investment units of Dean Witter. The new mortgage company plans no consumer advertising.

Allstate gave its own advertising a facelift in early 1986, fine-tuning its annual campaign from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

The 55-year-old insurer continued its "You're in good hands with Allstate" theme, used since 1950, but unified the effort with a broader range of spots highlighting its varied insurance products. "Leave it to the good hands people" also was added to copy promoting the company. Allstate ads earlier had focused on quick claims service for disaster coverage and on the convenience of locations within Sears stores. Ad spending grew 7% to an estimated $31.5 million, for 1986.

Allstate earnings have been hurt by industrywide losses from disaster claims: The unit's 1985 net income fell 8.5%, although revenues grew 15.5% to a new high. Allstate is the second largest personal property-casualty insurer, with a 10.2% market share, behind State Farm Mutual Insurance Co., Bloomington, Ill. The bulk of that business is written in auto insurance (70.8%), followed by homeowner coverage (17.9%).

A key strategy is to increase Allstate premiums by expanding its number of agents and sales offices. At yearend, Allstate had 4,760 total sales locations, including independent agents and 1,130 offices in Sears stores and Allstate sales outlets.

Coldwell Banker Real Estate Group, with 714 retail locations including 229 in Sears stores, improved both revenues and net income in 1985 because of lower interest rates and a favorable home-buying climate. The Los Angeles-based unit's revenues jumped 14.9%, while net income increased 13%. Its ad budget remained at $11 million, as BBDO/West, Los Angeles, mounted an image campaign featuring montage shots of varying homes, each with a Coldwell Banker "for sale" sign in front.

The unit's share of home resales was 7.5% in 1985, compared with 6% a year earlier, and the company forecasts a 9.8% share for 1986. The total residential resale market grew 12% in 1985, to 3.2 million units.

Commercial real estate sales will be bolstered by eight additional offices in new or existing markets opened in 1985 and another 10 planned this year.

Dean Witter Financial Services Group, New York, proved the most active of Sears Financial Network members last year, due mostly to expansion of its Discover card backed by an estimated $50 million ad budget handled by J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

Discover, introduced late in 1985 to Atlanta and San Diego test markets, has mounted an extensive media and direct mail campaign to sign up new cardholders with no annual fee and to urge them to use the card.

By August, Sears had signed up 4.7 million cardholders and planned by yearend to reach 22 million prospective customers through direct mail pitches. The mailings are sent to current Sears clientele. The company by August had reached agreements with 240,000 businesses to accept the card, which also can be used to make deposits and issue cash advances.

The Discover campaign's second phase, begun in August, is themed "the smart move" and encourages use of the card while heralding its belated entry into the New York market.

In 1985, Dean Witter earned net income of $13 million, following a $33 million loss a year earlier, on revenue growth of 14.5%.

Dean Witter's stock brokerage and other services at yearend were available at 683 locations, including 308 in Sears stores. The emphasis on consumer retail sales for Dean Witter was apparently the work of Robert Gardiner, who retired Sept. 1 as chairman. Mr. Gardiner, who also presided over a wave of defections in Dean Witter's investment banking division, was replaced by Philip Purcell, president and chief operating officer.

At the corporate level, 1985 saw many top-level changes. Edward Brennan moved to chairman-ceo of parent Sears, Roebuck, from president-chief operating officer, succeeding Edward Telling, who retired. Richard Jones replaced Mr. Brennan as president, retaining his title as chief financial officer.

In the Sears Merchandise Group, Michael Bozic in March was named president and chief administrative officer, a new post, after serving as president of Sears Canada Ltd. He was succeeded by G. Joseph Paddington, formerly senior vp administration &

Perspectives from an ANA director

Taxation a major threat to advertising

John Powers, vp-general manager of marketing in the consumer products division at Eastman Kodak Co., says he sees the threat of taxing advertising and defending First Amendment rights as special priorities for the Assn. of National Advertisers.

"A lot of laws are being put in place for the taxing of advertising," says Mr. Powers, who is a member of the ANA membership eligibility committee, executive committee and the advertising management standing committee.

"Washington made no bones about needing revenue from advertising if it can't get it from other means. States are doing the same thing. To protect advertisers, we at the ANA are keeping our ears attuned as we represent member advertisers," he says.

While taxes may be the biggest threat, infringement of constitutional rights also is a concern.

"Our lobbying group is keeping us apprised on First Amendment rights, such as the ban on cigaret advertising," says Mr. Powers, who was previously senior vp and management director at Leo Burnett Co.

John Powers
Eastman Kodak Co.

Mr. Powers, who was named Communicator of the Year in 1982 by Marketing Communications Executives International, has firm opinions on other advertising issues. On the trend to more in-house media buying, the Kodak executive says, "We continue to look at that and keep up to date, but we haven't seen the need to do that [go in-house]. We are doing more in-house media planning with our recent organizational changes . . . which require more coordination."

Regarding the trend toward diversion of media budgets to nonmedia promotions, Mr. Powers says he sees changes.

"The whole industry is getting smarter about user groups and targeting them. This is due to better research and new media use. It is folly to think we have users who buy three rolls of film per year and those who buy 150 rolls and attempt to reach them with the same message," says Mr. Powers, who is a journalism graduate of the University of Iowa.

planning for Sears Merchandise Group in the U.S.

In its third year of operation, Sears World Trade posted net losses of $11 million, compared with a $25 million loss a year earlier, on revenues of $236 million, a 24.9% gain. The unit added agricultural and industrial trading capabilities to its consumer goods activities and acquired certain portions of Netherlands-based Hagemeyer N.V., a trading company formed in 1901.

Sterling Drug's household products segment was the major bright spot in what was otherwise a lackluster performance in 1985 by the pharmaceutical company—1.6% growth in sales and a 23.5% decline in net income. Advertising and promotion spending was maintained at 1984's level.

Sales for the household and other products segment, which oversees marketing of such products as Lysol, Minwax, Mop & Glo, Perk floor care, Resolve carpet cleaner and Tussy Roll-on, rose 10% and operating profit increased 11%—spurred by a strong fourth quarter during which two new products were introduced under the Lysol banner.

The segment represented 32% of worldwide sales and 36% of over-all operating profit, up from 30% and 35%, respectively, in 1984. The segment also could boast of a total measured advertising budget slightly higher than that for proprietary products. Sterling's worldwide sales of $1.75 billion in 1985 still trails the record $1.76 billion reached in 1983. Operating income of $277.7 million in 1985, up 8.8% from 1984, continues to reach higher levels each year.

Proprietary products increased sales nearly 2.6% and operating income 50% or $40.5 million over the year-earlier period. The huge improvement in operating income came partly at the expense of reduced spending in advertising and promotion, but also from a boost in Bayer sales. A Food & Drug Administration ruling that expands the list of medical benefits for aspirin is likely to stimulate sales in 1986; however, Panadol sales have slumped.

In household products, the Lysol lineup was augmented with the introduction of Lysol Laundry Sanitizer, launched in late April and backed by a $10-plus million media campaign from Lowe Marschalk, New York, and $20 million in promotional spending to play up the theme "Not only whitens clothes but kills most germs." This marked Lysol's entry into the $50 million bleach market in which Oakland, Cal.-based Clorox Co.'s Clorox and Clorox 2 brands combined hold a commanding 57.2% share of market.

The traditional Lysol disinfectant product also has gained footing in the liquid bleach market, by positioning itself as a household disinfectant for laundry use as well. But Lysol Laundry Sanitizer, which claims to reduce household germs in the wash by 99.9%, is the first Lysol product specifically designed for use in the laundry. It has already become the No. 3 product within its market segment.

Advertising launching Lysol Cling thick liquid toilet bowl cleaner began in the national media in March, 1985, with $4.3 million in measured media backing. It forms the second part of a one-two punch in the liquid toilet category, after its kin product, Lysol toilet bowl cleaner. Cling's aromatic scent helps to position it as a toilet bowl cleaner-room deodorizer, while Lysol Regular is targeted for heavy-duty cleaning use.

Lysol spray disinfectant, the flagship product in the Lysol line, experienced strong sales, bolstered by a new campaign and close to $8 million in measured spending. Lysol deodorizing cleaner, now marketed as a cleanser that also disinfects, also received a new campaign and close to $6 million in media backing. Lysol Pine Action cleanser appeared in new packaging, which features a push-pull dual action applicator built into the twist-off cap. Total measured media spending for all Lysol branded products was $33.7 million, up from $32.4 million in 1984.

Sales of Love My Carpet rug and room deodorizer declined as the Lehn & Fink division introduced a reformulated and repackaged version in an effort to boost sales in March, 1985. Media spending totaled $3.6 million, up from $513,000 in 1984. Pretty as a Picture room air freshener was taken off the market.

The d-Con Co. recorded only moderate increases in sales, which company reports blamed on a cool, dry summer season with fewer pests. Mouse Prufe II was launched nationally in the spring of 1986 with $5.4 million in media ad backing. The entire d-Con line received only $5.3 million in 1985, down 7%. The d-Con brand holds a 10% share of the $637 million insecticide market, a category dominated by S.C. Johnson's Raid, which holds a 45%-plus share, while American Home Products' Black Flag line has a 20% share.

Resolve foam carpet cleaner was introduced last June. It is a companion product to d-Con's Resolve carpet cleaner designed for high traffic areas. The Resolve line had close to $3.7 million in measured media support.

One of Sterling's moist towelette products, Chubs, is the leader in pop-up moist towelettes for the baby-care market, recording double-digit sales increases. It was helped by $2.4 million in measured media spending, about level with 1984 expenditures.

Lehn & Fink, which achieved double-digit growth in sales, supported its Ogilvie haircare line with $5.4 million in measured media, up from $4.6 million in 1984. Ogilvie products received greater distribution and stepped up in-store promotion in 1985. The division's Tussy deodorants and antiperspirants received $3 million in ad backing, down 17%. Minwax Co. sales grew as new entries—carryovers from successful launches in the U.K.—entered the market. Minwax Polyshades stain and polyurethane, a new one-step product, completed its first full year on the market, and Minwax high performance wood filler was introduced last August. The Minwax line's media expenditures totaled $4.2 million, up 13.5%.

In the proprietary products segment, where sales bounced back from a decline of 8% from 1983 to 1984, Sterling got good mileage out of Bayer but experienced a decline in sales of acetaminophen-based Panadol. Sterling's worldwide otc analgesic advertising was consolidated at SSC&B:Lintas Worldwide. The agency move is part of a corporate effort to promote Sterling's mild-to-moderate analgesic proprietary drugs.

Bayer aspirin products, which received $13 million in measured spending, up from $12 million in 1984, holds an estimated 8% to 9% share of the about $1.6 billion U.S. analgesics market. Bayer's share has climbed in recent months following FDA approval in October of Sterling's petition to advertise to and advise the health profession on the use of aspirin to prevent heart attacks in certain high-risk individuals.

The Glenbrook Laboratories arm of Sterling has distributed 2.5 million patient booklets and sent Bayer samples to physicians and expects requests to reach the 10 million mark this year. Glenbrook also launched new advertising for Bayer with the theme, "The wonder drug that works wonders." Broadcast spots are based on a survey of doctors given a choice of two Tylenol brands, Advil or Bayer, if they were suffering from headache while stranded on a desert island. As the ads sum up, "Doctors chose Bayer, the wonder drug. Shouldn't you?"

Though climbing in share, Bayer has suffered from a category crowded with analgesic entries, most notably the debut of the ibuprofen-based products such as Advil (American Home Products) and Nuprin (Bristol-Myers). It has been reported that Sterling is expected to enter the fray with its own ibuprofen-based product. Company spokespersons declined to comment.

The second big proprietary product, Panadol, received $13.5 million in measured ad support, down from $20.4 million in 1984. The children's line for Panadol solidified its No. 2 position (after Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol), with its alcohol, sugar and aspirin-free formulations. Adult Panadol also faced aggressive competition from adult Tylenol, which is said to hold a 30% share of the market. Adult Panadol holds an estimated 2% share with $30 million to $40 million in sales, according to Robert W. Kirkpatrick Jr., senior vp, Duff & Phelps, Chicago.

Glenbrook Laboratories' Midol brand of menstrual pain relievers continued to lead that category, with close to $4 million in measured media backing, nearly the same as in 1984. Two line extensions, Midol Maximum Strength for cramps and Midol PMs, both were reported to be performing well.

Last October, Glenbrook introduced a new product into the women's antacid market, Calcitrel antacid, a sodium-free product with calcium. The Cunningham & Walsh campaign focused on network tv and print.

The maximum-strength version of Stri-Dex cleansing pads completed its first full year on the market, helping to increase sales of the brand. The Stri-Dex line received $2.6 million in measured media spending, up from $1 million in 1984.

Another product that completed a full year on the market, Lax Caps laxative, also helped to boost the performance of the Phillips' line (Milk of Magnesia), with more than $3.5 million in media support.

In the Winthrop division, Neo-Synephrine nasal decongestants offered a spray that provides dosage strength for all family members with measured media support of $1.7 million; Campho-Phenique antiseptic gel was repositioned as an aid in the fight against cold sores, receiving a $2.1 million media budget. The pHisoDerm skin cleanser line added an oily skin formulation to its regular and light-scented versions. The brand was backed by $4.2 million in measured media, up from $2.9 million in 1984.

Sterling sold Bayer AG, the West German company that owns Miles Laboratories, the right to buy back partial rights to the Bayer trademark in the U.S. for $25 million. Bayer's stateside trademark rights were abrogated by World War I. Bayer now can use its name on industrial products and chemicals; Sterling will continue to market its aspirin product under the Bayer name and symbol in North America.

In the pharmaceutical specialties segment, Sterling is awaiting approval from the FDA for an intravenous form of milrinone, used for the short-term treatment of congestive heart failure. An oral form of milrinone is in the advanced stages of clinical trials, and a new drug application for the oral form is expected to be filed by the end of the year. According to Value Line Investment Survey analysts Keith A. Markey and Rudolph C. Carryl, it "could be a blockbuster . . . because it has a broader therapeutic range and less toxic side effects [than digitalis], the only other drug in its class." Milrinone would be marketed under the Corotrope brand name.

Sterling announced the sale of its Hilton-Davis chemical business in Jan. 1986. Sterling also approved the sale of the optical brighteners component of Hilton-Davis to Mobay Chemical Corporation, a subsidiary of Bayer A.G., for $7.5 million.

Sterling formed a new worldwide organization, Sterling International, comprised of four subgroups responsible for various geographic segments. Sterling International, which markets products in more than 125 countries, had international sales representing 38% of Sterling's business and 24% of its operating profits last year, after currency conversion.

In August, 1985, Sterling elected James P. Stoker to the position of corporate vp-quality. He had been the corporate director-quality. Lawrence W. Chakrin was elected corporate vp-research, after serving as president of the Sterling Research Group. Joseph Scarlata, a corporate vp, became senior vp of Sterling Pharmaceutical Group. Harry Shoff became president of the Winthrop-Breon Laboratories division. Michael R. Gallagher became senior vp of Lehn & Fink Products Group, after serving as president of the group's consumer products division. Richard Gaccione succeeded Mr. Gallagher, becoming president of the consumer products division after having served as vp-marketing.

Sterling purchased 103 acres of land in River Vale, N.J., for $8.6 million, which will be the site of a new world headquarters to be occupied in 1990.

Stroh Brewery Co. began to search aggressively for new growth areas during 1985, a year in which it held onto the No. 3 spot among brewers despite a slip in market share.

Privately held Stroh, which produces 12 brands of beer and six line extensions, isn't limiting its growth to the beer industry, which has endured four straight years of flat sales. The company became a major player in the cooler segment by the end of 1985 and early in 1986 entered two other categories, nonalcoholic malt beverages and juice-added soft drinks.

Stroh's beer shipments slipped from 23.9 million bbls. in 1984 to 23.4 million bbls. in 1985, a decline of 2.1%, in an industry in which total shipments were up less than 1% for the year. Stroh's share of the domestic beer market was 13.1%, down from 13.4% the previous year. It trailed Anheuser-Busch, St. Louis, with 38.1%, and Philip Morris' Miller Brewing Co., Milwaukee, which held a 20.8% share.

Stroh positioned itself for profitability, even if beer sales remain stagnant, by closing its aging hometown brewery in 1985 to eliminate an overcapacity problem and allow it to compete in a price-cost environment that is dictated by A-B's drive for market share. Stroh also planned by the end of 1986 to retire its debts related to the 1981-acquisition of F&M Schaefer Brewing Corp., Allentown, Pa., and 1982 acquisition of the Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., Milwaukee, moves that catapulted the family-owned regional brewer into a national force.

The national rollout of White Mountain cooler showed Stroh's strategy of putting its resources into new high-growth categories. Introduced in March, 1985, by Stroh subsidiary Colorado Cooler Co., White Mountain cooler was taken national within four months.

It was the only malt-based cooler to perform well in the segment, which is dominated by wine coolers. White Mountain took an estimated 6% market share in 1985 despite not being widely available until midyear, and Stroh claimed its second-half shipments ranked it No. 3 with a 16% share, behind No. 1 California Cooler from Brown-Forman Distillers Corp., Stockton, Cal., and E&J Gallo Winery's Barties & Jaymes, Modesto, Cal.

Stroh spent an estimated $7 million in media to establish White Mountain cooler during 1985, but by July, 1986, had increased its annual ad budget for the brand to $20 million. An orange flavor was added in March, 1986.

Stroh is putting additional marketing muscle behind another new product, Sundance, a "100% natural juice sparkler" introduced in California and other western states in March, 1986. Stroh planned to contribute $6 million into California during 1986 for the introduction of the 70% juice and 30% sparkling water beverage. Most entries in the juice-added category, led by PepsiCo's Slice, use a 10% juice base. Produced by Stroh subsidiary Pacific

Health Beverage Co., Sundance is available in four flavors and is being positioned between soda pop and bottled water. Stroh planned to take Sundance national by the end of 1987, with an estimated $70 million advertising and promotion budget by then.

Stroh launched two other new products in the spring of 1986. Barbican, a nonalcoholic malt beverage imported from England's Bass Brewery, was introduced in New York with plans for national rollout during 1986. The introductory $1.5 million campaign via MCA featured ex-football player Franco Harris. Stroh's goal is to expand the nonalcoholic malt beverage category, which accounted for less than 1 million bbls. in 1985.

Stroh launched another import, Konig, in several eastern states, with a campaign via MCA that highlighted the beer's status in the world's top beer-drinking country. "Konig is Germany's No. 1 selling beer. No ifs, ands or Beck's" was the theme line.

One of Stroh's strengths in the beer market is its broad product line, giving it the ability to capitalize on segments that exhibit the best volume trends. Stroh officials forecast that the price-beer segment (sold below the popular-price category) will grow from 14 million bbls. in 1985 to 20 million by 1990. Stroh completed its national rollout of price-beer Schaefer brand in February, 1985, and sales for the year were up nearly 10% to more than 4 million bbls.

Stroh also showed strength in the popular-price segment, where its Old Milwaukee brand led the category and was the No. 5 beer over-all. Sales of 7.5 million bbls. of Old Milwaukee (up 5.6% from 1984) and 1.6 million bbls. of Old Milwaukee Light accounted for nearly 40% of Stroh sales. The increase in sales occurred despite a 20.7% decline in measured advertising to $13 million in 1985.

The company ran into tougher going in establishing its flagship Stroh's brand, which went national in 1984. Sales in 1985 declined 5.7% to 5 million bbls., as full-year measured media spending for the brand declined 34% to $21 million in 1985.

In October, 1985, the company launched a major drive to establish the brand as a mainstream premium beer. The repositioning began with a $50 million, 12-month ad campaign via Lowe Marschalk, New York, that broke during the World Series telecast on ABC. The longtime Stroh's theme, "From one beer lover to another," was replaced with "Stroh's is spoken here." Waylon Jennings starred and sang in a country spot in the campaign.

The ailing Schlitz brand got little support for most of 1985 with the exception of a June regional campaign via Point Communications, Dallas, using actor Larry Hagman of "Dallas" fame saying, "I want all the gusto." In November, Stroh named Vic Olesen & Partners, Los Angeles, to do creative to revive Schlitz, which had declined in sales from a high of 13 million bbls. in 1978 to 1.5 million in 1985. Ex-football player Lyle Alzado signed on as Schlitz spokesman, and Stroh planned to spend $5 million in ad support for the brand during 1986.

Stroh took its superpremium Signature national in May, 1986, backed by a $10 million campaign that relied heavily on magazines, including an eight-page advertorial via MCA that profiled the exploits of Richard Konkolski, a Newport, R.I., sailor who made two solo voyages around the world.

The national rollout came despite slack sales in the superpremium category, which is dominated by A-B's Michelob. Signature was introduced to regional markets in the spring of 1982, and Stroh sold 150,000 bbls. of the brand in 1985 in seven eastern and midwestern states. Stroh marketing officials say a weakening of the U.S. dollar would make imports less competitive with domestic superpremiums on price.

Primo, a Hawaiian-based Stroh brand, was repackaged in Hawaii with a green bottle and a label that duplicated the one used for the beer at the turn of the century. Stroh began a stateside test of Primo in February, 1986, in Boston, where the brand was positioned in line with Canadian imports. Promotions such as "Hawaiian nights" were used for the introduction.

The $8 million to $10 million Schlitz malt liquor account was set adrift in August, 1985, when Benton & Bowles merged with D'Arcy MacManus Masius, which handled A-B's Budweiser. Stroh awarded the account in October, 1985, to MCA but in May, 1986, moved it to Chicago's Burrell Advertising, the nation's largest black-owned agency. A new campaign, themed "Smooth operator," was launched in July, 1986, and seeks a more upstream clientele. Schlitz malt liquor remained the segment leader with an estimated 36% market share in 1985, while No. 2 Colt 45, from G. Heileman Brewing Co., La Crosse, Wis., had 33%.

Another megamerger cost Stroh another agency in April, 1986. BBDO resigned the $20 million Old Milwaukee account and $80 million in Stroh media buying because of its planned merger with Doyle Dane Bernbach and Needham Harper Worldwide, which handled a $100 million-plus account with A-B. Stroh said it was pressure from A-B that had caused BBDO's resignation. Stroh awarded the Old Milwaukee creative to Grey Advertising, New York, and at press time was weighing the decision on media buying.

Stroh, looking for advertising and promotional activities that would create niches instead of always going head to head with A-B and Miller, in June, 1985, introduced the "Stroh's Circle of Sports" show on USA Network and a broadcast tv syndicate. The weekly two-hour sports magazine show, which ran for the summer, was produced by Ohlmeyer Communications Cos., New York.

Stroh also was involved in sponsorships of events such as auto and motorcycle racing, board sailing, hockey and jazz festivals.

Its most successful promotion in 1985, however, was its second annual Run for Liberty, held Oct. 12 in 127 cities and on 15 military bases. More than 135,000 runners took part in the world's largest single-day running event, with part of their entry fees going to Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island restoration project. The 1986 Run for Liberty was moved up to June 28 to take advantage of the hoopla surrounding the July 4 rededication of the statue.

Stroh was one of the sponsors of the ABC telecast of the rededication events and broke special creative that featured use of the John Lennon song "Imagine."

In September, 1985, acting assistant attorney general Charles Rule ordered closed the two-year investigation into Stroh's complaint about beer advertising exclusivities held by A-B and Miller on network tv sports. Stroh complained that exclusivities prevented the company from reaching its prime target, men who watch live-action sports.

Under most exclusivity arrangements, an advertiser pays a premium rate for the distinction of being the sole sponsor of its kind during a broadcast.

Since filing its complaint, Stroh has gained access to more sports, principally Major League Baseball, but Stroh officials credited that to Miller's decision to decline its previous exclusivity.

Tandy Corp.

Tandy Corp. launched an image-changing campaign in 1985 with new, more business-oriented products, refurbished stores and a dress code for computer center personnel. It came on the heels of one of its worst fiscal years.

During fiscal 1985, Tandy suffered its first down year in earnings per share in the past 23 years and the first major inventory writedown in its history. As it began fiscal 1986, Tandy assembled an array of new products, such as a home satellite dish system and a transportable cellular telephone, to maximize growth opportunities.

Tandy Corp. in fiscal 1986, ended June 30, reported worldwide sales growth of 16.9% and a net income increase of 4.8% as estimated U.S. advertising dropped 3.6% to $187 million.

Tandy is the largest domestic retailer of consumer electronics with more than 9,000 outlets, two-thirds of which are company-owned. Tandy offers more than 2,700 products, over half of which are manufactured by the company, through its Radio Shack stores in North America and Tandy International Electronics overseas.

Radio Shack Computer Centers sell computers and peripherals to business customers. Tandy's recent acquisition of two brand-name appliance and consumer electronics chains signals a more aggressive push into the high-growth sector of the appliance and consumer electronics market.

In November, Tandy introduced the Tandy 3000, which is compatible and meant to compete with IBM's high performance AT. The Tandy 600 laptop was introduced in October, priced at $1,599. A Tandy spokesman said the 3000 has done well and the 600, which was understood to have a limited market, met expectations.

Margo McGlade, securities analyst with Paine Webber, New York, says although portable computers (the category in which laptops are included) accounted for 5% of Tandy's sales in fiscal 1985, the percentage will be smaller this year.

The Tandy 3000 took off more slowly than anticipated because of problems with the AT-compatible product, according to Ms. McGlade. Although the software that enables multiple use recently became available, the 3000 didn't have the impact it might have had the software been available sooner, she says.

In July, 1986, Tandy introduced five computers designed to give the company a line of products that competes with IBM's PC, XT and AT in home, education and business markets. The products include the Tandy 3000 personal computer (new version); the Tandy 3000 HL, said to run four times faster than IBM's PC XT; the Tandy 1000 SX and Tandy 1000 EX, both said to run 50% faster than IBM's PC; and the Tandy Color Computer 3, with twice the speed and up to eight times the memory and better graphics than the company's 64K Color Computer 2.

The new products mark a significant strategy for Tandy, which seems to be moving aggressively into the business market. Tandy now offers a bundled product of software, power and hardware for the home user at a good price, according to Paine Webber's Ms. McGlade. "From the product standpoint, Tandy has distinguished itself," she says. "It has added value to the product and made it a little better than what the business customer could buy from a pure IBM clone maker or even from IBM.

"Tandy doesn't have a corporate image of a company like Compaq, which targeted the corporate customer from the beginning. Apple is going through a transition to develop a professional image with corporations. Tandy is going through the same process. We'll see how successful it'll be in the next 12 months."

As part of that image process, and in a continuing effort to better position Radio Shack stores in the marketplace, Tandy is remodeling and refurbishing its retail stores during the next five years at a cost of $80 million.

New stores feature a high-tech look that includes charcoal, silver gray and orange colors, neon lighting and new subtle wall displays. Recently remodeled stores also display signage that says, "Radio Shack: The Technology Store."

The renovation, at the rate of three stores a day, is being done to emphasize a shift in the company's image to a chain carrying many leading products like satellite dishes and computers. Some remodeled stores are showing 25% to 30% sales gains according to Ed Juge, Tandy director of market planning.

Tandy opened 68 retail Radio Shacks and 12 Radio Shack Computer Centers in fiscal 1986. A total of 68 Computer Centers are planned for fiscal 1987, 44 of which will be converted from large computer departments into separate Computer Centers. Tandy anticipates the same rate of openings for its retail stores.

Another part of Tandy's changing image is its business products division. A dress code was recently established for 3,000 employes who work or provide support for Tandy's 489 Radio Shack Computer Centers. The code, however, is not applicable to the retail division.

The strict policy, which includes no facial hair and only dark-colored, conservative business attire, received a lot of publicity, but only a few employes complained vehemently, according to Mr. Juge. The code is part of a comprehensive upgrading plan in the business products division designed to make employes look and feel a part of the team.

In its audio business, a VHS stereo audio deck and a stereo tv were introduced. Tandy also sells an adaptor to enable any tv to receive broadcast stereo sound. Radio Shack stores sell more than one-fifth of all audio speakers sold in the U.S.

Just as Tandy hopped on the compact disc player early in 1984, the company introduced the first advanced do-it-yourself home satellite dish system in February, 1986.

The Realistic 2500 home satellite system, which retails for $1,999, has been a strong seller despite the confusion over cable scrambling.

Analysts predict the satellite dish market should come on strong by early 1987 when the scrambling issue should be clearer to the consumer.

Analysts believe consumers will realize that scrambling is a factor on only a few selected cable television channels, and the dish owner will be able to watch a tremendous variety of programing despite scrambling.

Tandy's other major product market is telephones—both regular and cellular.

While Tandy Corp. is No. 2 behind American Telephone & Telegraph in retail sales, it also commands 10% to 15% of the total U.S. cellular telephone business, according to Tandy officials.

Tandy has experienced phenomenal growth in the cellular telephone market.

Its transportable cellular telephone retails for $1,199—its closest transportable competitor costs about $3,000. Tandy's Mr. Juge says the company has trouble keeping the item in stock.

Tandy has working agreements with one of the area carriers in every area where cellular service is available. At Radio Shack, a customer can go into the store, buy a phone, fill out the necessary papers, be assigned a phone number that will be programed on the spot and walk out of the store talking on a cellular phone.

Eugene Glazer of Dean Witter, New York, says Tandy has begun to establish the infrastructure to be one of the key players in the emerging market for mobile cellular telephones. Exclusive agreements with many carriers to provide hardware, installation and service are in place.

With a high-volume manufacturing facility in the Far East, Tandy could become a low-cost producer in this market, Mr. Glazer says.

In April, 1985, Tandy entered the name-brand discount retailing business with the acquisition of Scott-McDuff, a chain of 24 audio-video-appliance stores. In early fiscal 1986, Tandy acquired 207 VideoConcepts stores. Tandy opened 21 McDuffs in fiscal 1986.

With the Radio Shack chain as the foremost private label retailer in the consumer electronics industry—Tandy has a 49% share of market in radio and tv stores, which represent 65% of its sales, and Federated Group is No. 2 with a 6.27% share.

Audio-video-appliance name brand retailing will be handled separately in 8,000-to-10,000-sq.-ft. stand-alone stores and 3,000-sq.-ft. mall stores, according to Tandy officials.

In May of this year, Tandy announced plans to open 50 new stores in six new hubs by year's end in Houston; Denver; Kansas City, Mo.; San Antonio, Tex.; Tampa, Fla., and San Jose, Cal. Currently the chain has 250 stores nationwide under the McDuff, VideoConcepts and Scott Appliance Co. names.

Time Inc. is on an acquisitions hun last year purchasing Southern Progre Corp., publisher of Southern Livin and Asiaweek, an English-langua newsmagazine based in Hong Kong. also is taking a significant minority i terest in Parenting, a San Francisc based magazine scheduled to sta publishing at yearend.

Last year's sale of notes and th pending sale of 20% of its America Television & Communications cab tv systems company will help fun corporate acquisitions. The compan however, has not abandoned hom grown publications: It restarted Pictu Week in July and has a variety of i ternally developed projects in vario stages of testing.

The magazine division in 1985 su fered the company's only decline pretax operating profit of 6% to $1 million, despite revenue gains 12.2%, due to the March, 1985, acqu sition of Southern Progress Corp. F the second quarter of 1986, the com pany's magazine group recorded ope ating income of $74 million, up 8.8% Circulation revenue rose 8%. Ad pag were down 1% to 2% from last year quarter, but ad revenues were up abo 4% because of a hike in rates from 5 to 6%.

Revenue from the video operation division in 1985—representing HB Cinemax and ATC—increased 9.2 and pretax operating profit was also u 3% to $220 million.

Books and information service showed a total revenue gain of 12.4 and pretax operating income of $8 million, up 31%. The gains were pr marily because of the addition of O moor House (a division of Souther Progress) and profit increases in th book business and at Selling Area Marketing Inc., Time Inc.'s marketin information services unit. However operating profit for the division fell t $12 million, down 7.7% in the secon quarter of 1986.

The company put the majority of i ad dollars behind cable's Home Bo Office, Time-Life Books and Tim Inc.'s top three magazines—People Sports Illustrated and Time. Over-a the company shifted its marketin mix, devoting more dollars to cab networks and spot tv, at the expense radio.

Of the company's major spender only HBO had a measured ad spend ing decline, down 31% to $10.5 mi lion. This budget reflected a return t normal ad spending levels after shakeup in 1984 that saw the pay cab service revamp its schedule and chai

Perspectives from an ANA director

Organization should stress the basics

G.F. Tyrrell, vp-advertising at Johnson & Johnson, says that he favors a back-to-basics approach at the Assn. of National Advertisers.

"I think it is important to get back to the original objectives [of the ANA]. It is important to improve quality of advertising by training young people, and the ANA can provide that service to members," says Mr. Tyrrell, who is a member of the executive committee, the membership eligibility committee and chairs the television advertising standing committee.

Mr. Tyrrell is a 21-year veteran at Johnson & Johnson and was previously vp-product management for the personal products company. Before joining J&J, he worked at Benton & Bowles, BBDO and Lennen & Newell advertising agencies. In addition, he was a product manager with Standard Brands' Burlington Hosiery Co.

Regarding the trend of many advertisers toward more spot market activity and diversification of traditional media dollars into nonmedia promotions, Mr. Tyrrell says, "I think it is potentially damaging to brands. The shift into spot tv brings up serious questions."

On the issue of shorter rollouts with new product development, he said, "I see companies going back to classic test markets.

"People who have taken the time to be careful are not overly concerned. I think the fly-by-the-seat-of-the-pants approach has not worked. While it may be expensive to test, if it is done carefully, it pays off."

Mr. Tyrrell is a director of the Ad Council and volunteer director of the council's National Red Cross campaign.

He is also a member of the National Advertising Review Board.

man-ceo Michael Fuchs come aboard.

HBO put $6.7 million in spot tv and $2.6 million in magazines to attract more viewers in a time of flat growth. No. 1-ranked HBO is settling it out with No. 2-ranked Showtime/The Movie Channel for exclusive deals with major studios for film rights. In 1985, HBO saw slight subscription gains to 14.6 million.

In the magazine group, ad pages for Time Inc.'s magazines reflected an over-all softening in the market, but, with the exception of its struggling Discover, the publications posted modest gains in ad revenues. The slowdown in magazine revenue, however, caused the company to institute layoffs in an effort to cut annual expenses by $75 million.

In ad spending, People topped the list, spending $18.3 million in measured media, up 22%. People devoted $14 million to spot tv and $2.8 million to network tv. The magazine in 1985 had record ad revenue of $250.7 million, up 8%. Ad pages were down 5% to 3,866.

Time followed with $15.2 million in measured media, up 38% from 1984. It spent $10 million in spot tv and $4.4 million in cable networks. The newsweekly's $347 million ad revenue total again led the magazine industry despite a 4% decline from the year earlier. Time's closest competitor, Newsweek, had ad revenues in 1985 of $247 million, down 2%.

Sports Illustrated spent $12 million in advertising, the majority of it devoted to spot tv and cable networks. Although SI did not have the heavy advertising it had during the 1984 Olympic year, and ad pages dropped 8%, ad revenues rose 3%, to $237.3 million.

Once again, the weakest performer in the magazine group was Discover, in the depressed popular science magazine category. It showed a 40% decline in ad revenue to $6.3 million and a 4% drop in ad pages to 417.

In an effort to bolster Discover's performance, Time Inc. in June purchased competitor Science 86 for $5.75 million, plus $7 million in subscription liabilities. The company hopes to retain about 35% of Science 86's 739,301 subscribers, but observers are skeptical about whether the purchase will solve the publication's problems. Discover had minor ad spending in 1985, amounting to $375,000 to promote a tv program, and $16,000 in a magazine mail order promotion.

Time Inc.'s leading ad spender was Time-Life Books with a $20.8 million budget, up 14%. Time-Life Books spent $15.3 million in magazines and $3.3 million in spot tv. The books division was buoyed this year by the success of "The Library of Nations," a sociologically oriented geography series, and "Understanding Computers." A third series, "Your Home," was terminated because of poor response.

In mid-July, 1986, Time Inc. named N. J. Nicholas Jr. president and chief operating officer. He is in line to succeed J. Richard Munro, president and chief executive of Time. Mr. Nicholas was exec vp-video operations. Mr. Munro also was given the additional post of chairman, succeeding Ralph P. Davidson, who was named chairman of the executive committee of Time's board.

Toyota Motor Sales U.S.A., a subsidiary of Toyota Motor Corp., Japan, the leading car and truck importer in the U.S., placed renewed concentration on Toyota cars in 1986, particularly the sporty compact Celica line, which served as the centerpiece of the 1986 Toyota lineup that includes 65 new car and truck models.

Trucks, however, continued to have strong support, shifting to more of a 50-50 split between car and truck advertising at Toyota.

Toyota Motor Corp., the parent company, reported record worldwide sales of $24.3 billion, down 2% from 1984, and earnings of $1.2 billion, the same as a year earlier. Sales and earnings for both 1985 and 1984 fiscal years, ended on June 30, were converted from yen to dollars at the rate of ¥249=U.S.$1.

orldwide auto production behind eneral Motors Corp. and Ford Motor o. and is followed by Nissan Motor orp. in fourth place. Its Japanese ompetitors—Honda, Mazda and Mitbishi—rank 10 through 12, respecvely.

More than half of Toyota cars and ucks are exported worldwide. A recd 1,901,786 units of a total 1985 prouction of 3,535,495 units, plus 9,197 knockdown sets, were sold in verseas markets. The export figure cludes 1,138,428 passenger cars, up 7% from 1984. Exports to North merica totaled 955,358 units, a rise 17.6%, which Toyota attributes to creased demand and more favorable onomic conditions in the U.S. Pasnger cars represented 66% of the vecles shipped to the region.

Toyota sales in the U.S. approached e 1 million mark in 1985, hitting an l-time high of 949,977 total units—20,047 cars and 329,930 compact ucks—up 13.4% from a year earlier. he total represented a 6.7% share of e U.S. market and 23.4% of the imrt market. Despite intense competion in the U.S., Toyota still ranks first mong Japanese importers, followed Nissan at 21.3%, Honda at 19.5% d Mazda at 8.4%. The company also d in total truck sales, followed by issan and Honda.

But Toyota followed Nissan, Honda d Mazda in establishing U.S. manucturing plants. Toyota finally began nstruction of U.S. manufacturing faities to assure itself of an adequate pply of cars in the U.S. market, a pply curtailed by self-imposed uotas assumed by Japanese marters under the Voluntary Restraint greement.

In April, 1985, Toyota and General otors joined forces in a car manufacring operation called New United otor Mfg. Inc., with a plant in Freont, Cal. In August, 1986, Toyota nounced it would build between ,000 and 12,000 of its new FX 16 rs in Fremont, split between two odels, one carrying a base price of out $9,000; the sportier GT-S is exted to sell for $10,000 to $11,000. oduction will advance to between ,000 and 50,000 units during 1987. M named Toyota as Chevrolet's rtner in producing the compact car.

In December, 1985, Toyota anunced it had selected Georgetown, ., as the site for its $800 million proction complex to build up to 0,000 units per year of the Toyota mry when it comes on stream in id-1988. The company also set 1988 r the start of production at a new 00 million Canadian plant to be ilt at Cambridge, Ont., southwest of oronto. That factory ultimately will oduce 50,000 Corolla-class cars a ar.

Opening of these North American oduction facilities is in line with oyota's announced plans to seize 10% the world's auto market by the 90s, a marketing concept the comny calls "Global 10." In January, 86, the company passed a milestone Japan with the production of a nite Crown Toyota, its 50 millionth it since the "A1" prototype in 1935.

The Toyota Corolla, with sales of 8,378 units, was once again the comny's best-selling model in the U.S. It s followed by the Camry at 128,132, e Celica at 80,480 and the Tercel at e low end of the line at 88,841 units. he Toyota van and the MR2 midenne sports car accounted for sales of out 32,000 each and the high perfoance Supra, at the high end of the e, sold 23,569 units.

Operating in the restrictive environent on car imports, Toyota threw a fty portion of its media weight beind advertising for trucks, which were affected by market quotas. Truck lvertising for the year, led by spot d network tv, topped $40 million, ving rise to criticism that Toyota adrtising was neglecting the car sector.

Toyota passenger cars accounted for ly $6.2 million in the company's easured media expenditures for 985, but other car categories received ecial attention, with the MR2 sports car supported by a seven-media outlay of $15.3 million and the Toyota Celica getting $6.8 million, mostly in network and spot tv.

Use of cable tv dropped to $4.3 million, down from $4.8 million a year earlier when Toyota was ranked eighth among the top 10 users of cable.

Now in its 16th year of production, the Celica featured numerous changes including an all-new body design, front-wheel drive and a powerful new 2.0-liter engine.

Toyota retired the 6-year-old "Oh, what a feeling" theme and replaced it with a new slogan borrowed from George Gershwin: "Who could ask for anything more?" for the new creative umbrella—the "more" emphasizing the company as a full-line marketer, says Toyota, out to shake its image as a small-car marketer.

Of 10 new commercials touting the theme, half were for cars and the other half for trucks.

The company continued its use of celebrity spokesmen, for the second year making use of pro golfer Lee Trevino to pitch the full line of trucks and vans. Supporting the tv effort was a major print campaign in magazines, a series of full-page, full-color ads, spreads and three-page gatefolds that singled out specific products. On behalf of trucks, one full-page ad plugged the new top of the line 4-by-4 SR5 Xtracab Turbo, priced at $12,118, emphasizing its roominess and standard features such as the seven-way adjustable sports seat and am/fm/mpx stereo, and the low end standard bed truck, which stressed its $5,998 price, "unchanged in five years."

Magazine ads also featured Toyota's Cressida, the company's luxury leader; the second-year version of the Corolla GT-S sport coupe and liftback; the Camry and its improved power and performance; a virtually unchanged MR2 sports car, and the new features of the low-end Tercel models.

Toyota's flagship performance car, the new upscale Supra, accounts for some 8% of sales, but the company reportedly spent a much larger percent of its ad budget for its introduction this spring. Priced at $18,990 for the basic liftback model, the Supra has been redesigned and its production increased. Toyota expects to sell 30,000 in the U.S. this year, up from last year's 23,569.

Early this year, Toyota joined a sponsorship and marketing program with Opryland USA Inc. of Nashville, Tenn. The program includes sole sponsorship by Toyota of all matinee performance of the Grand Ole Opry, sponsorship of a series of seven special musical events at Opryland and display of Toyota vehicles at the Opryland Hotel and Opryland. The deal also allows Toyota the option of offering trips to Opryland as incentives for its sales staffs and customers.

UAL Inc., whose United Airlines subsidiary has struggled through the cutthroat fare wars, is poised for accelerated growth after last year's purchase of Hertz Corp. and this year's acquisition of trans-Pacific airline routes from Pan American World Airways.

With three major travel service companies under its belt, the Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based parent of United Airlines, Westin Hotel Co. and Hertz, now has the capability of marketing a broad range of travel packages in its major markets.

Parent UAL suffered a net loss on sales growth of 8.4% in 1984. The loss was attributed to a 29-day pilot strike and competitive fare discounting at United. The United Airlines unit, largest U.S. airline, reported operating revenues of $5.29 billion in 1985, a 14.9% drop from a year earlier. The airline represents 85% of total revenues. The carrier itself posted a net loss of $88.2 million, compared with net income of $252.4 million for the year earlier.

In the first quarter of 1986, UAL posted a net loss of $103 million, compared with a loss of $661,000 a year earlier, on revenues of $1.96 billion, up 23%. United alone lost $107 million, attributed to intense fare wars and expenses connected with the Pan Am route purchase.

Despite the financial downturn, UAL has found new ways to grow by acquiring other airlines, new routes from other carriers and entering alternate segments of the travel industry.

Last August, UAL completed its acquisition of New York-based Hertz Corp., the world's largest car-rental company. UAL paid RCA $587.5 million in the deal. The Hertz buy immediately made UAL the premier travel marketer, selling airline seats and renting cars and hotel rooms on a national and international basis.

Operational efficiencies have been the primary benefit of the United-Hertz-Westin combination, as United's 50,000 Apollo computer reservations terminals provide an easy way to sell services from one or all of UAL's operating units. Marketing tieins have begun, too, with United flights and Hertz car rentals sold on a package basis in many vacation markets. United execs say they are prepared to increase such activity as the airline business gets more competitive and as other airlines team up with competing travel companies.

In February, 1986, United began serving 11 new Pacific cities through its $715.5 million purchase of routes, planes and facilities from Pan American World Airways, New York. (United already served Tokyo and Hong Kong.)

The new routes came just as European terrorism made many Americans fear travel to those countries. United is one of a few major U.S. airlines that does not fly to Europe.

In July, the airline announced its intention to acquire for $146 million the assets of Frontier Airlines, Denver, from financially troubled People Express, Newark, N.J. Frontier has lost $10 million a month since People Express purchased the carrier in 1985. United earlier purchased 25 Frontier planes for $265 million.

But United and the Air Line Pilots Assn. never could negotiate compensation terms for Frontier employes, stalling talks and ultimately scotching the acquisition.

United serves 173 cities through 156 airports, using 343 owned and leased aircraft. It is the only airline to fly to all 50 U.S. states, and it also serves Canada, Mexico, the Bahamas and the Far East. UAL proudly proclaims United "the world's largest investor-owned airline," and it appears to have recovered successfully from last year's pilots strike, regaining its top-ranked 17% market share among U.S. airlines by pushing AMR Corp.'s American Airlines back into its former No. 2 position.

United's purchase of Pacific routes from Pan Am added 2,700 employes to the company's payroll and several million dollars to its ad budget, handled by Leo Burnett USA, Chicago. Ads themed "A fresh breeze across the Pacific" introduced the new service with a Japanese-style theatrical approach, while later ads highlighted cities and schedules.

The airline has continued its long-running "friendly skies" theme, basically unchanged since Burnett won the account in 1965. This year, it added a minicampaign, themed "I need a vacation," to promote low summer fares in the U.S. A modified extension will continue through the fall, vp-advertising John Ruhaak says. Network tv spending has increased, particularly for the Far East introductory campaign, while the airline continues to rely on newspaper and radio ads for standard fare and schedule information.

United also added a new discounted fare class for tickets purchased 14 days in advance, joining the heavily restricted 30-day advance purchase ticket and unrestricted fares requiring purchase seven days or less in advance.

United's Hawaii bookings have continued strong, while the airline also has established a new north-south hub at Washington's Dulles International Airport to connect Northeast and Southeast cities.

The new hub joins those in Chicago, Denver and San Francisco. Departures from United's Chicago headquarters hub alone represent $2 billion in revenues.

The airline belatedly has made a strong push into smaller regional destinations, forging marketing links with Air Wisconsin, Appleton, Wis., and Aspen Airways, Denver, in which both carriers' planes were renamed United Express.

The linkup enables the smaller airlines to provide "feeder" traffic to United's vast domestic and international route systems. Computer reservations terminals now use United's designator codes for the newly added flights, and schedules and fares have been integrated.

Hertz Corp., which reported only four months of operations under UAL in 1985, had disappointing earnings on intense competition in the rental car industry. The company says its costs of doing business climbed 6% in the past two years, while rental prices rose just 2%. Still, Hertz by January had achieved a 32.8% share of airport car rentals, compared with No. 2 Avis, with 26.2%.

The company had "fleet utilization"—similar to airlines' load factors—of 72% last year.

The company last year began updating its service offerings, adding computerized driving instructions at 62 locations and testing an automated rental and return system at others. It also has expanded nationwide a toll-free emergency road service. Its estimated $22 million ad spending this year has been used to promote these service offerings under the new theme, "Don't just rent a car, rent a company."

Hertz no longer promotes its leadership position in the market.

The Seattle-based Westin Hotel chain pushed up net income as it added new properties and accelerated its practice of selling older units to partnerships while retaining management contracts.

The chain added new hotels in Denver, New Orleans and Washington during 1985 and has opened new hotels and resorts in Singapore and Stamford, Conn., so far in 1986. Other new units opening later this year are in El Paso, Tex., and Fort Lauderdale, Fla. Like United, Westin's primary international presence is in the Far East. Individual hotels and hotel groups are advertised by local agencies on an independent basis using separate ad budgets.

Cole & Weber, which last year lost the corporate ad account to DYR, retains pr duties for the chain.

Netherlands-based Unilever B.V. viewed the U.S. market with a two-fold strategy in 1985: Acquisition and intensified marketing. While the acquisition attempts went awry, stepped up marketing efforts helped the company build market share against major competitors like Procter & Gamble, which outbid Unilever for Richardson-Vicks in its major acquisition disappointment.

The domestic arm of Unilever, including National Starch, Thomas J. Lipton Inc. and Lever Bros., refocused its attention on the U.S. consumer products and personal products sector in 1985, seeking to grow through acquisition.

When Richardson-Vicks rejected its $1.24 billion bid for P&G's $1.55 billion offer in September, Unilever vowed to continue its acquisition search. It subsequently was linked as a potential buyer of Gillette, Beatrice, Chesebrough-Pond's, although no buyouts materialized.

According to the company, R-V "would have been an extremely good strategic fit, but we were not prepared to pay more than our assessment of its worth and were overbid." Stung but not beaten by its loss to P&G, Unilever through its Lever Bros. unit went after P&G's marketing lead, particularly in the personal products and detergent sectors.

Lever Bros. expended $102 million on new product investment, up from $62 million in 1984.

The company brought in Wayne Nelson, noted for his business-building savvy, to be president of the personal products sector. The appointment of the former Johnson & Johnson and P&G exec was seen as a move to resuscitate the flagging division, especially in toothpastes, where market shares have remained flat compared with growth of P&G and Colgate-Palmolive.

In April, 1985, Lever Bros. moved Aim toothpaste to SSC&B:Lintas from Ogilvy & Mather. Aim had been steadily dropping in market share, reaching a low of 7% in 1985, down from 10% in 1984.

Aim's all-time high was 14%. Heavy competition from P&G's Crest with 31% of the category and Colgate with 23% prompted Lever to raise spending for Aim to $20 million, up 40%. Lever's Close-Up remained at the 8% market share of 1984. Both Aim and Close-Up joined the crowd in introducing pump versions in 1985.

By far, Lever's strongest marketing assault in 1985 was on the detergent market, where the company sought to stem Tide powder's No. 1 spot, or 22.5% share, of the $2.95 billion heavy-duty laundry detergent segment. Lever's Surf powder, tested in Houston, claimed a 13% share of the market. It had an estimated $1.6 million in measured spending. It had only 50% distribution in the U.S. as of July, 1986.

The company also put big promotional and advertising bucks behind Wisk, the No. 1 brand in the liquid category, matching P&G's $50 million spending for Liquid Tide dollar for dollar.

As a result, Lever not only defended its top position in the $1 billion liquid detergent market, but raised its share from 8% to 8.8% during the first half of 1985. A powder version of Wisk is currently in test.

Encouraged by the success of Wisk liquid, Lever introduced a liquid automatic dishwasher detergent under the Sunlight name. In 1985, Sunlight automatic dishwashing powder, which reached a distribution of 25% of the country, grabbed a 20% share of those markets, a considerable jump from 8% in 1984.

According to Leading National Advertisers, spending for Sunlight dishwasher detergent reached $26.4 million in 1985, up 36%.

Lever continued to pummel away at P&G's 46.7% share of Downy's liquid fabric softener market share with liquid Snuggle. Snuggle, which reached national distribution in August, attained a 30% share two months later through aggressive spending of $15.3 million in measured media—up from $2.8 million in 1984—according to LNA.

SSC&B, which handled the introduction, also introduced nationally Snuggle fabric softener sheets with a $3.2 million budget in network, spot and cable tv, according to LNA. Volume growth for Unilever in the detergent sector was 15% in 1985, according to the company.

In the shampoo market, Unilever's Dimension barely worked up a lather with a 3.6% dollar share of the $1.24 billion shampoo market, despite projections of a 6% share by analysts. The splash made by P&G's spinoff of its bar soap, Ivory shampoo, with a 5% share, was the impetus for Lever Bros. to consider extending its Dove into a high-margin upscale shampoo. J. Walter Thompson USA is the agency; Dimension Shampoo and Conditioner received $6 million in measured support in 1985.

Lever Bros. foods division proved particularly strong in the $1.6 billion retail margarine sector, where Lever's Shedd's Spread Country Crock line, acquired in 1984, bolstered by a new corn oil spread and a stick called Classic Quarters, moved the brand into the No. 1 position in the intermediate segment, which accounts for 60% of the margarine sold annually. A $10.4 million campaign by Stone & Simons, Southfield, Mich., put Shedd's in the lead as the highest spender in the margarine race in 1985. Promise, with less than $1 million in spending, remained with a 1% market share.

Lever also extended Mrs. Butterworth's syrup into a light form backed by $2.4 million in measured spending in 1985.

In 1986, Clive Butler was named to head Lever Foods division, which became Lever's second largest business in 1985, experiencing a 20% volume gain.

Unilever's Thomas J. Lipton unit was strengthened in 1985 with new products and the appointment of James Benson to senior vp-marketing, a post that had been vacant for nearly two years. In September, Lipton rolled out International Soup Classics and repackaged and expanded its Hearty Soup mixes. Lipton is the market leader in dry soups with a 27.6% dollar share of the $434 million category. Lipton spent $25 million on advertising its various soup lines, according to LNA, up 23%. Major lines making up the total were instant soups, measuring $16 million in advertising, up 8.7%, and Cup-a-Soup, $6.9 million, down 8%.

Lipton's decaffeinated tea, which had been slated for a 1983 rollout and was held up by production difficulties, was launched nationally in the last quarter of 1985. SSC&B themed the ads, "Lipton tea, you made decaffeinated just for me." LNA put spending for the product at $1.6 million in 1985.

Pitting itself against General Food's Crystal Light in the powdered NutraSweet flavored drink segment, Lipton introduced Sunkist Light in eastern and southern markets in June, 1985, and backed it with $2.5 million for the year. Lipton was expected to match GF's ad budget for the new brand, which was $18 million in 1985, according to LNA. Sunkist Light agency is Foote, Cone & Belding, New York.

Union Carbide is a mere vestige of its former self. Gone are the batteries, the auto and home products among others that put it in the public eye. "We're turning into a new Union Carbide with more focus, simpler product lines. This is a new beginning," says a company official.

What remains is a smaller company, with total annual sales at about $7 billion compared to $9 billion last year. Advertising will be much reduced. A Union Carbide source says basically all of the company's advertising now will be to its technical trades only.

The new beginning for the chemical maker comes after a year or more of suffering like a sort of corporate Job through repercussions of the lethal chemical spills at Bhopol, India, and Institute, W. Va; layoffs and closings, company restructuring; and a takeover attempt by GAF Corp., Wayne, N.J.

Perspectives from an ANA director

Supporting right to advertise is No. 1

Martin L. Orlowsky, executive vp-marketing and sales, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., says he sees the Association of National Advertisers moving toward being a stronger voice in advertising and the role of the advertiser in our society.

"Certainly the ANA stands strongly for the right to advertise. With our complex environment, there should be the opportunity to communicate in a responsible manner. In today's world, communication is complex and subject to influence, and clearly Congress has taken an active role in assessing this area. I'd say that's the single most important area for ANA today," he says.

On other current advertising issues, Mr. Orlowsky who serves on the ANA executive committee, the National Advertising Review Board and the magazine advertising standing committee, says there is increasingly more market segmentation and use of promotion.

"Segmentation has had an impact on media with regional use of tv, magazine and local radio. Marketers are more knowledgable [about] where business opportunities are best maximized.

Martin L. Orlowsky
R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.

"Geographic/demographic segmentation allows marketers to be more targeted. There is movement toward less homogenous U.S. [targeting] and more specific targeting."

The Long Island University graduate says that promotion is being used more often today.

"Promotion may be in lieu of media advertising for a lot of product categories because they are competing in ways they haven't in the past. Promotion offers different opportunities. It uses the entire marketing mix. It is recognition that promotion action offers more leverage."

Mr. Orlowsky, who has extensive agency experience, was senior vp and director of marketing and media services at Needham, Harper & Steers before joining Reynolds in 1977. Before Needham, he was vp-associate media director at Grey Advertising and worked at Young & Rubicam and Compton Advertising.

' in late 1984, Union Carbide's stock fell to 30¼ a share in December, 1984, but during the confidence-building time of restructuring the stock began to climb, going into the 60s by October, 1985. Taking note were investors, including GAF, a chemicals and building materials marketer, which offered in December, 1985, $4.3 billion for the much larger Union Carbide. GAF planned to finance the takeover by selling off Union Carbide's consumer products lines. A "boot strap, junk bond, bust up deal," cried Union Carbide's Chairman Warren M. Anderson. GAF withdrew its bid this January, 1986. At that point, UC began to bust up itself.

In protecting itself against this and similar takeover attempts, Union Carbide developed a strategy to sell its most immediately attractive businesses and buy back a large amount of its stock.

The consumer products segment was put up for sale in January. Two weeks later, Union Carbide repurchased 38.8 million shares of its common stock for $775 million cash and $2.55 billion in debt securities.

In April, 1986, Union Carbide sold its Glad plastic products line and its Prestone antifreeze and other automotive products to First Boston, Inc., New York, investment bankers, in an $800 million leveraged buyout. Included in that sale was STP Corp., Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., which Union Carbide had bought from Beatrice Cos. in April, 1985, for $87 million.

Starting July 1 as First Brands Corp., the company has two divisions, home products and automotive products, and continues to be housed at Union Carbide's headquarters complex in Danbury, Conn.

According to Jim Timmes, First Brands' home products advertising manager, "Basically we expect to have the same advertising/marketing program for the Glad line of wrap and bags . . . and will continue the products with our agency, Leo Burnett, Chicago. One difference is that we will shift to a July 1-June 30 fiscal year from a calendar year."

Speaking for the other First Brands line, Stuart Benedict, advertising manager of automotive products, says, "Basically our products are not changed—Prestone, STP, Simoniz. We're going to support the brands well, and we're ready for the competitive fall market for antifreeze."

Also in April, 1986, Union Carbide announced the sale of most of its Eveready battery business to Ralston Purina Co., St. Louis, for $141 million. The new unit is to be called Eveready Battery Co.

"Technically the sale was Eveready battery properties and markets worldwide," explains George Klein, marketing-advertising manager for Eveready, "but because of varying conditions in different markets, the sale process is still going on." The battery management operations are to remain in the Danbury offices until July 1, 1987, with an expected management move then to St. Louis. Expectations are that First Brands and Eveready will continue to obtain manufacturing materials from Union Carbide.

During these mega-shifts in ownership, speculation has centered around the future of the big ad billings involved, including nearly $15 million for Prestone, Simoniz, and STP products plus about $23 million for Glad wrap at Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, and $28 million for Eveready/Energizer batteries at William Esty Co., New York.

Sales for the newly trim Union Carbide in the first six months of 1986, were just a shade ahead of last year, reaching $3.36 billion in June, 1986 compared to $3.36 billion in June, 1985. Net income from operations was down 45% to $95 million from $172 million.

Eveready Energizer-labeled battery products took the biggest part of the company's total measured advertising of $68.6 million, up 13% from 1984. The brand drew $27.6 million, up 24%, in measured advertising support. Included was a major campaign for the new supercharged "AA" Energizer battery which kicked off in August with the energetic Olympic gold medal gymnast, Mary Lou Retton, who led off commercials with, "Now! The Longest Lasting Energizer Ever."

The Eveready line is in its heaviest competition yet as Rayovac, moving to make a comeback, now has 10% of the market, and leader Duracell controls 48% to Eveready's 42%. The biggest part of Eveready spending is for network tv which rose 25% in 1985, to $25.6 million.

Union Carbide's second heaviest ad spending was for its Glad wraps and bags, which took 35% of the total budget, or $22.8 million, up 72%. Spot tv spending more than tripled for Glad in 1985, shooting to $7.3 million from $2.2 million the year before, while network tv was off 9%, falling to $9.97 million.

Advertising for antifreeze leader Prestone, with about 53-55% of that market, was up 9% for the year, to $8 million. Northern Petroleum's Peak is now the No. 2 brand. The major ad medium for Prestone, network tv, rose 9%, to $7.3 million.

Union Carbide gave good support to the new STP brands it acquired in April, 1985, from Beatrice Cos. Total advertising spending for eight STP oil, gas, and cooling-system products was $6.7 million, up 21% from Beatrice support in 1984. Biggest backing was on network tv where the total rose 9%, to $3.6 million. Spot tv was off 4%, to $1.54 million.

Simoniz car wax, which has 10-12% of that market after Du Pont and Turtle Wax, was supported by $226,900, all for spot tv. This was just about one-quarter of the $927,700, spent in backing Simoniz in 1984.

In 1985, the consumer products division realized 3% higher sales, to $1.97 billion in 1984 and inching up 1% in operating profits to $229 million.

Union Carbide Corp. now consists of four business segments: Chemicals & Plastics, a core group of the company, producing common plastics and many materials of common products; Industrial Gases—the Linde Division—an international business and the biggest source of industrial gases in the Western Hemisphere; Carbon Products, maker of custom-designed carbon and graphite components in high-heat—usually industrial applications; and Specialties & Services, called by Union Carbide "a broad family" of businesses to supply needs ranging from high-tech electronics materials to bottled oxygen for home medical use.

Commenting on the new directions, securities analyst James Wilbur of Smith, Barney, New York, says the bulk of the chemical industry has been shifting to production and products with more consumer franchises, "so this is sort of a strategic setback for Union Carbide. This does more than move them back to their original operational base. It exposes them to more cyclicality." He explains further, "But they have scaled down more wildly. Carbide had gotten a bit more gangly even than most of the chemical companies. This forces on them a kind of efficiency."

Concerning the future of the new Union Carbide, he says, "First Boston (which bought the household and automotive lines) probably will only temporarily hold the companies as an intermediate owner, then will transfer control to others."

Union Carbide, prior to its sale of its consumer lines, went through a massive restructuring in August, 1985, that included write-offs and write-downs of assets plus big staff cuts worth $1.2 billion, and the divestiture of units that the company termed "non-strategic" businesses. More than 4,000 employes were released under restructuring in 1985; another 2,711 left Jan. 1, 1986. Union Carbide employment has decreased for several years, and while the company's worldwide employment fell 2% from 1983 to 1984, it dropped 7% from 1984 to 1985. Altogether, the company expects restructuring and other changes to cut its executive staff by about 50%.

Mr. Anderson, chairman, announced his retirement, effective the end of 1986.

In the first quarter, 1986, Robert D. Kennedy, who was president, became president-ceo. Presidents of the four new business segments are: Chemicals & Plastics, H. William Lichtenberger; Industrial Gases, John R. MacLean; Carbon Products, Vance E. Sonnenberg; and Specialties & Services, Heinn F. Tomfohrde III.

The U.S. Government's advertising spending dropped 10% in 1985 as the government's largest spenders—the U.S. Postal Service, Amtrak, military services and the Treasury Department—eliminated programs or opted for smaller increases.

Military service recruiters, with the lion's share of the U.S. ad budget, checked in with only a 7% increase in fiscal 1985, or $177.5 million. The Pentagon wanted to spend closer to $190 million. For fiscal 1986, military personnel estimate they will spend 8% more, or $192.4 million.

The Postal Service, faced with dire predictions of deficits, cut its ad budget last year by 5% to $39.7 million and intends to spend about the same amount this year.

Amtrak in fiscal 1985 spent nearly 9% more, or $28.6 million, but in 1984, it had rolled in with a 25% budget hike. And the Treasury Department phased out its $40 million campaign for Olympic gold coins. It plans more conservative spending—about $20 million in fiscal 1986—for its Statue of Liberty gold coin program.

The military services, USPS, Amtrak and Treasury together account for nearly all of the government's advertising. The rest of government is likely to spend even less in the next several years; congressional budget-slashing has forced many bureaucrats to scrap plans for public service campaigns.

This year has been turbulent for the Pentagon's recruiting efforts. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger wants to put more money into the joint services advertising account and take away dollars from the individual services' efforts. He is said to believe this will be a more cost-effective way to bring in recruits.

Next fiscal year the department wants a $223.2 million ad budget, with the joint service program looking to double its budget to $31.3 million. Grey Advertising, New York, handles the account, which is one of five military ad contracts under review.

In 1984, the services enjoyed their best year ever in signing up new recruits, and 1985 was nearly as productive. In the first half of 1986, however, Navy recruiting, despite a $10 million ad budget increase, was lagging, while the other services were meeting their goals. Because the pool of high school students will decline in the next several years, the services see problems ahead and hope to boost their budgets accordingly.

The Army, handled by N W Ayer, New York, wants a $112.8 million budget for 1987, up from the $94.5 million it expects to spend this year. In fiscal 1985, it had a $93.8 million budget, with $18.4 million going to the Army Reserve and the Army Reserve Officers Training Corps.

The biggest spender in the government, the Army in May decided to reopen its contract for review three years early, in part because of the conviction of an N W Ayer vp for embezzling $60,000.

A congressional subcommittee also had threatened to hold hearings on the Pentagon's procedures for awarding military ad contracts, but after the Army announced its contract review, the subcommittee likely will send a letter to the Defense Department suggesting ways to encourage more competition.

The Navy, handled by Ted Bates Advertising/New York, had a 52% budget increase last year, to $19.9 million, and expects to spend $31.2 million this year. Trying to increase its size to staff a larger fleet of ships, the Navy will cut back next year, with a proposed $24.7 million budget.

The Marine Corps, handled by J. Walter Thompson USA, Washington, held steady last year with $17.2 million; it will spend $19 million this year and seeks $18 million in 1987.

The Air Force also was in a budget holding pattern, with $16.8 million in fiscal 1985 and an estimated $16.3 million this year. It wants $18.3 million next year. The account was moved from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, to Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York, effective Oct. 1, 1986.

Army National Guard had $8.4 million last year, $12 million in 1986 and seeks $15 million in 1987. The Air National Guard spent $2.3 million in 1985 and estimates only slightly larger budgets this year and next. Both accounts are with Needham Harper Worldwide, Washington, which decided not to pursue the contract, which expires Sept. 30.

Joint services' ad budget was $18.5 million in 1985 and will be about $16.3 million this year. Grey Advertising, New York, is now the agency, but the contract is under review.

The Coast Guard, whose budget has been slashed to only $588,000 in 1985 and about $508,000 this year, will switch agencies Oct. 1. Thomas Buffington & Associates, Washington, has grown too large to compete for the contract, which is earmarked for small business. The Coast Guard expects it will barely meet its recruiting goals this year, aided by the free publicity it earned by directing ship traffic at New York's Liberty Weekend on July 4.

The Postal Service, handled by Young & Rubicam, New York, spent $17.4 million in measured media on its Express Mail service, which continues to trail Federal Express in sales and ad spending. USPS calculates Federal Express' ad budget is four times greater. Other postal ad dollars back its Zip + Four program targeting companies, stamp collecting, new postal service regional structure and Intel-Post, an unprofitable international electronic delivery service.

Amtrak, under Needham Harper Worldwide, had a $28.6 budget last year and will spend more this year. In January it launched a $25 million "Magic" tv campaign in 22 markets. The new theme, "There's something about a train . . . that's magic," promotes the nostalgia and romance of train travel.

The U.S. has had few new ad campaigns. This year it will spend about $20 million promoting Statue of Liberty gold and silver coins via Grey Advertising, New York. The Treasury Department so far has sold 7.3 million coins and contributed $40 million to the statue's restoration. Advertising will finish at the end of the year.

Treasury is reviewing agencies for a new $5 million to $8 million campaign to advertise U.S. gold coins targeted to investors as competition for the Canadian Maple Leaf. The agency will be selected by September, with advertising to begin in October.

The U.S. Travel & Tourism Administration spent $1.1 million last year via N W Ayer, New York. The "America—Catch the Spirit" print campaign ran in Germany, Canada, Mexico, England, France, Australia, Italy and the Netherlands. The ads included coupons for information on U.S. travel destinations. The response, according to the USTTA, has been favorable, but the White House again has proposed to eliminate the office in 1987.

The General Services Administration last year spent $1.3 million to advertise excess government buildings and land for sale. Kennedy-Wilson, Santa Monica, Cal., handles.

Public service advertising accounted for $8.1 million of the total in 1985, only up slightly from 1984. The Advertising Council handled $2 million in government contracts, down 17% from 1984. The National Highway Traffic & Safety Administration phased out its $480,000 drunken driving campaign, saying the campaign had raised awareness of the problems and local enforcement of drunken driving had increased.

Next year, the Ad Council breaks a $400,000 campaign for the Interior Department's public lands and parks. The Census Bureau also will spend $250,000 to heighten awareness of the 1990 census.

Some government agencies are turning to private groups to help publicize their efforts. For example, this year the Public Health Service and American Red Cross together distributed three spots about AIDS. The Red Cross footed most of the bill.

Van Munching & Co., New York, turned in a strong sales performance in 1985, according to the company, which was reflected in increased ad spending in every medium except network radio.

VM, a privately-held company that markets Heineken, Amstel Light and Grizzly Canadian Lager stateside, also remained one of the nation's biggest spenders on spot radio by increasing its 1984 expenditures 3% to $31.7 million in the medium. The company also jacked up its network tv contribution by 116% to $6.5 million, according to Leading National Advertisers.

In a time when the domestic beer segment is flat, the 63-million imported beer segment grew 10% in 1985, driven by yuppies who drink less, but better. And VM, which initiated the segment more than 50 years ago, has continued to benefit from that growth.

The company continues to be the biggest ad spender in the imported beer category—devoting the bulk of its budget to its flagship brand, Heineken. VM backed Heineken with $17.6 million in measured media, an increase of 12% compared with 1984. In addition, the company devoted a large percentage of its $31.7 million spot radio budget to the beer import leader. This year, the company added a new campaign to complement its winning "Come to think of it, I'll have a Heineken" theme. The new theme, "Satisfy your thirst for the best," gives the old theme a twist, while simultaneously reiterating the brew's No. 1 position in the market.

While Heineken's market share continued to decline—moving from 41% in 1980 to 31.7% share in 1985 in the increasingly crowded category, a drop of 2.3% compared with 1984—sales remained healthy. Heineken last year depleted 34.5 million cases, an increase of 3%, according to M. Shanken Communications' Market Watch, an industry trade. The brand remains the hands-down beer import leader, followed by Martlet Importing's Molson beer, with a 12.8% share. There are now some 400 import brands on the market.

With Heineken's market share down, VM has turned to new products to maintain its strong position. Next to Heineken, one of the biggest success stories in the business has been VM's Amstel Light beer. Amstel Light, introduced in 1981 continued to soar, moving to 2.4 million cases, up 60% over 1984, according to Market Watch. And its measured media spending of $6.3 million, up 125%, reflected this growth.

Amstel is the only light beer on Market Watch's Top 10 Imported Beer Brands list. It is ranked eighth. In five short years, Amstel has made a name for itself through a combination of heavy ad support, promotions and a strong distribution network. Late last year, Amstel Light went on network tv, marking a first for the imported light segment. The company spent $2 million in network tv for Amstel, and another $2.4 million in spot tv.

Observers say Amstel's fast success has taken growth away from Heineken, noting that Heineken's sales increases have slowed since Amstel's introduction. The company disagrees, noting that last year it was confident enough in the separate identities of the brands to pair the brews in single retail displays.

VM's success is partly due to the booming imported beer segment, but observers hold high praise for the company's style and leadership. So far, VM has had no product losers. Its newest brand, Grizzly Canadian Lager, is a case in point. While Canadian imports showed a decrease of 2%, according to the National Assn. of Imported Beverages, Washington D.C., Grizzly depletions advanced 24% to 900,000 cases. The brand, which received $196,000 in measured media, is still far behind imported Canadian leader Molson, whose sales were flat in 1985 at 14 million cases, according to Market Watch. Early 1985 figures for Grizzly's other competitors showed Moosehead at 7.3 million cases, up 5.8%, and Labatt's at 5 million cases, up 8.7%. Sales for both brews, however, may ultimately reflect different figures when the final tally is in.

Part of Grizzy's success can be linked to VM's fast targeting change, from a beer aimed at 18-year-olds, to a brew skewed toward an older audience. While the initial ad approach targeted the nation's youngest drinkers, the changing drinking age forced the company to aim at the 21-and-up crowd. The ad theme now is "Capture Canada's Bear of Beers." "Eighteen is no longer a useful number," says Alvin Nilson, ad manager. "With the drinking age changed in most of the states, we are automatically skewing toward an older audience."

Volkswagen of America, a subsidiary of Volkswagen AG, moved further along the comeback trail in 1985 while positioning itself to rejoin the low-end arena later in 1986.

Advertising spending at the Troy, Mich.-based subsidiary rose 18% and continues to increase, reflecting sales increases and a more competitive U.S. automotive market, which Volkswagen will invade in December, 1986, with its low-end Volkswagen Fox.

The Fox, which borrows a retired Audi division name, will be imported from Volkswagen do Brasil. It is expected to be in the $5,000 price range, about the same or a little less than the Hyundai Excel from South Korea.

The vehicle will be an addition to the VW mainstays—Golf, Jetta, Scirocco, Quantum and Vanagon. The low-end segment is growing rapidly, dominated at present by Hyundai and Yugo, the $3,990 import from Yugoslavia. The category is expected to continue gaining as Japanese marketers move upscale to higher-profit cars while other low-wage nations become sources of inexpensive vehicles, both on their own and as "captive imports" for domestic marketers.

Volkswagen is no stranger to low-priced cars, having established itself in the U.S. with one. But VW has not had a true entry-level car since the Beetle was replaced by the Rabbit in 1975.

The Fox is being counted on to help VW toward a scaled-down goal: 3% of the total U.S. car market by 1990 for Volkswagen, another 1% for Audi. (In a 10 million car market, each share point is 100,000 units.) That is down from an announced goal of 7% when VW's U.S. marketing umbrella included Porsche brand, but more realistic and attainable, says VWoA president Noel Philips.

Just before the 1986 model year began, Volkswagen of America separated the marketing functions of Volkswagen and Audi divisions, following a 1984 study by New York consulting company McKinsey & Co. Ad agency Doyle Dane Bernbach, Troy, Mich., continues to handle both accounts.

VW gave up on trying to treat Audi as a "tradeup" brand for customers who outgrow VW. Research showed the strategy degraded Audi and didn't help Volkswagen. The move allows both brands more freedom to focus their marketing images.

Volkswagen's U.S. 1986 model year campaign concentrated on value, quality and durability messages while retaining the "It's not a car, it's a Volkswagen" theme. One magazine spread showing all the VW models and headlined "The smartest way to spend $50,000 on German engineering is to buy them all" points up not the quality, value and durability imagery, but the German heritage. VW has taken that tack for several years after it went aground playing up the Westmoreland, Pa., assembly of its Rabbits. VW already ignores actual country of origin ad references, which undoubtedly will be helpful with Fox's link to a country not known for auto making.

While the Golf and derivative GTI models are curreatly the only products assembled at Westmoreland, the feasibility of also building the more popular Jetta there has been under study for more than a year.

There also is an advertising effort to shed a "one-car company" image, which still lingers among prospects who remember the Beetle, before the Fox arrives. That led to VW becoming the first auto marketer to use the new 15-second tv commercial. Starting with the January, 1986, Super Bowl telecast, VW broke a new campaign of 15-second spots on prime-time tv, usually on newsbreaks. All creative featured a single model and a price. The idea was to make more consumers aware of the range of models VW has and prepare the way for Fox.

With the heavy tv campaign, 1986 ad spending picked up quickly as expected and will lead into new Wolfsburg Limited Edition models, four-wheel-drive editions of Scirocco, Vanagon and Quantum in the spring and to the Fox arrival.

But even before the 1986 campaign, network and spot tv jumped from 55% of the measured national budget in 1984 to slightly more than 60% in 1985. Magazines slipped from 41% in 1984 to less than 37% in 1985.

With the 1985 sales gain and the likeliness of further increases in 1986, VW increased factory contributions to dealer ad associations by 25% to 30%. Total funds spent on media purchases by VW-brand dealer associations (groups of dealers in 30 markets) reached an estimated $25 million in 1985, including $7.2 million in measured spot tv. Some dealers fund programs exclusively while VW and the dealers share costs in others. At Audi, dealer group spending is estimated at $12 million. VW's estimated $12 million contribution to the various VW and Audi ad groups is included in the unmeasured advertising tally.

Audi division's rapid growth rate cooled a bit in 1985, despite a renewed effort the last quarter to sell "85 [85,000 units] in '85." "Audi, the art of engineering" ad theme was carried over for the 1986 model year. Tv, equally split between network and spot, got less than two-thirds of Audi's $28.5 million measured media, with magazine buys at $10.9 million capturing nearly all the rest.

The sleek 5000 body style and new derivatives like the performance-oriented fulltime four-wheel-drive 5000 CS Quattro continued to get the lion's share of ad spending, eclipsing the smaller 4000 and Audi Coupe models.

A spring print campaign in magazines and newspapers revived an old VW tradition: Ads without pictures of cars. The campaign used cartoons by well-known artists surrounded by lots of white space in full-page ads touting Audi leases for $298 a month.

In August, 1986, Audi responded to a disputed charge that 5000s were prone to unexpected surges of acceleration. Audi had weathered recall demands by consumer groups and an investigation by the New York state attorney general, but the banning of Audis in a number of New York parking garages finally prompted Audi to run regional ads to counter it.

Warner Communications turned to its best-performing segments—entertainment and communications—in 1985, selling its interest in a number of subsidiaries and buying out American Express' 50% ownership in Warner Amex Cable Communications.

In the process, the company sold some of its biggest advertising units, including Franklin Mint, bought by American Protection Industries for about $167.5 million, and MTV Networks, purchased by Viacom Inc., which had owned one-third of the cable tv network. Franklin Mint spent $29.4 million in measured spending in 1985, and MTV Network spent $5 million, according to Leading National Advertisers. These totals were not included in those of Warner Communications for this report.

Warner's divestitures had considerable say in its profitability in 1985. It reversed a 1984 net loss in profits, helped by an aftertax gain of $94 million on the sale of cable tv units MTV Networks and Showtime/The Movie Channel as well as the sale of a portion of its interest in Hasbro Inc. The divestitures reduced Warner's debt by 64% to $510 million. Other savings came from a 40% decrease in corporate overhead, to $33.5 million, and a 31% decrease in interest expenses, to $77.1 million.

Warner bought out partner American Express Co.'s 50% interest in Warner Amex Cable Communications in August, 1985, for $450 million and assumed $550 million in debt. The company recouped its costs by selling its 66.1% interest in MTV Networks and its 19% interest in Showtime/The Movie Channel to Viacom International for more than $510 million, generating a pretax gain of $187.1 million.

Warner's 1985 turnaround showed further progress in the first half of 1986 when it reported net income of $82 million, up 64% over earnings in the first half of 1985, and revenues of $1.33 billion, an increase of 29.4% over year-earlier figures.

During 1985, Warner's filmed entertainment division improved upon 1984's record performance. Operating income of $160.2 million exceeded 1984's previous high by 7%, and revenues of $1.2 billion increased 10% over the previous year. Warner's total operating income in 1985 was $286.6 million, up 12%.

Warner's share of both the U.S. box office and domestic film rentals made it the most successful motion picture company in the industry. Tv syndication revenues, foreign theatrical rentals, pay tv licensing and domestic home video sales all reached new highs in 1985.

Warner Bros. positive results in 1985 occurred within an industry that suffered declines in both revenues and attendance for the first time since 1980. Domestic box office revenues fell 7% to $3.75 billion while attendance was off 11% to 1.06 billion.

Of the 26 industry titles exceeding the $15 million mark in domestic film rentals, eight films were Warner Bros. releases.

Warner Bros.' most successful 1985 films, all achieving $20 million to $30 million in domestic film rentals, included, "The Goonies," "Police Academy 2—Their First Assignment," "National Lampoon's European Vacation," "Spies Like Us" and Clint Eastwood's "Pale Rider." Other substantial domestic earners in 1985 were "Pee Wee's Big Adventure" and "Mad Max: Beyond Thunderdome." Warner Bros. spent more than $167 million, including measured and unmeasured media, to advertise its movies in 1985, up 2% from 1984.

The biggest expenditures in measured media for new releases—and virtually all spending on movies was in network and spot tv—was $4.9 million for "The Goonies," $3.7 million for "Spies Like Us" and $3.3 million for "Ladyhawke."

Warner Bros. plans to release about 20 films in 1986, down from the 26 pictures released in 1985. This year Warner is showing strong gains with its releases. By midyear, "The Color Purple" had brought in $80 million in box office revenues; "Cobra" starring Sylvester Stallone, $50.5 million; "Police Academy 3—Breaking Training," $45 million, and "Wildcats," $22 million.

U.S. videocassette sales of $6 million or more have been earned through mid-1986 by "Best of John Belushi," "Mad Max: Beyond Thunderdome," "Gremlins," "Goonies" and "Pee Wee's Big Adventure." Revenues from foreign rentals hit an all-time high of $139.9 million in 1985. Stephen Spielberg's "Gremlins" was the top title, with foreign rentals projected to reach $40 million.

Warner's recorded music division in 1985 also produced the best results in its history, in both income and sales. Warner Records got multimillion unit sales from Madonna, Dire Straits, Prince, ZZ Top and John Fogerty. Atlantic Records strength was highlighted by the success of Phil Collins' "No Jacket Required," with worldwide sales of more than 7 million units. Motley Crue's "Theatre of Pain," with worldwide sales approaching 3 million units, paced Elektra/Asylum's performance in 1985. International earnings in the division were up 65% in 1985 because of numerous successful releases from international and local recording artists.

The division is getting good results in 1986 from Van Halen's "5150" and Prince's "Parade" released in late March.

The company's publishing division and related distribution division reported record revenues in 1985, but operating income fell 15% to $13.7 million as weak newsstand sales hurt DC Comics and Warner publisher services. During the first quarter, Warner publishing had slight gains largely because of the success of "If Tomorrow Comes" by Sidney Sheldon and "Fit for Life" by Harvey and Marilyn Diamond.

The company's cable and broadcasting division showed strong improvement in 1985. That performance continued into the first half of 1986. During that reporting period, division sales of $158.6 million produced operating income of $7.1 million, which compares to a loss of $4 million in 1985.

Warner-Lambert Co. entered several new over-the-counter markets in 1985 with new product entries ranging from chewable calcium supplements to chewable cough squares, but the company's bottom line performance belied its stepped up product introductions and market share growth in home-diagnostics and otc products.

Last year the company introduced 13 new products, a company record, up from eight launched in 1984. The company's heavy research and development expenses of $208 million in 1985, up 7%, with 30% of that total attributed to nonprescription products, should keep the new product pipeline going at least through 1986.

But despite the aggressive new product launches, Warner-Lambert sold its hospital supply and services division, resulting in a charge of $553 million against aftertax earnings for a one-time writeoff that brought net income to a loss of $312.6 million on a 1% growth in revenues. Also included in the loss were costs related to pulling the anti-arthritic drug, isoxicam, out of the international market because of its alleged side effects.

W-L also has begun to shore up its operations in 1986. Some 550 jobs have been cut through voluntary retirement programs and cost-cutting and consolidation measures in U.S. and overseas distribution and manufacturing facilities. W-L expects to save $40 million annually from these measures.

The sale of Warner-Lambert's medical divisions, announced last November, got the company out of the diagnostics and hospital supply business as trends in the healthcare industry increased demand for low-cost products and services. W-L's hospital suppiy divisions accounted for 12% of corporate sales, or about $330 million, but less than 1% of its operating profit last year. Results from 1984 were restated to reflect the divestitures.

General Diagnostic division, a clinical diagnostics unit, was the first division to be sold last August, to Organon division of Akzo N.V., for an undisclosed amount. In March, 1986, Becton Dickinson & Co. bought W-L's Deseret Medical division, maker of catheters, for $225 million. In April, 1986, W-L sold San Diego-based IMED Corp. to Henley Group for $163.5 million. And in May, 1986, W-L sold Reichert Scientific division, maker of microscopes and fiber optic instruments, to Cambridge Instrument Co. for an undisclosed price. Reichert had sales of about $100 million in 1985.

In further restructuring moves, W-L shifted 16 Parke-Davis division otc products, including Anusol, Tucks, Benylin and Benadryl brands, to its consumer health products group in January, 1986. The consolidation is expected to cut sales and marketing costs and enhance distribution in food and discount department stores while maintaining strong presence in Parke-Davis' traditional stronghold, drugstores.

The company revamped and diversified its media schedules last year, using outdoor advertising for the first time in two years. Network radio measured spending received the biggest increase, up 49% from 1984, while spot radio dropped 35%. W-L also increased its measured magazine spending by 25%, while newspapers declined 18%. Both network and spot tv spending declined, 4% and 3%, respectively, as the company moved heavily into cable tv advertising, up 15%.

On the agency side, megamerger fallout affected several brand assignments. In June, 1986, W-L severed its 30-year, $68 million relationship with Ted Bates Advertising/New York following that agency's acquisition in May by Saatchi & Saatchi plc, London. W-L shifted $38 million in billings for Rolaids, Efferdent, Remegel and Mediquell brands to Young & Rubicam, New York, which already handles Certs and Dentyne gum for W-L.

J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, a W-L agency since 1961, picked up $30 million worth of business when W-L assigned its largest-selling brand, Halls cough tablets, as well as Listermint, and Trident and Bubblicious gum accounts. JWT already handles such major W-L products as Listerine, e.p.t. early pregnancy tester and the Schick shaving products division.

New product introductions in 1985 included two chewable calcium supplement products, Suplical and Theracal, as well as Early Detector in-home colorectal cancer test, Remegel antacid, Sticklets gum and Benadryl allergy medication. Line extensions introduced last year were Decongestant Mediquell cough suppressant and improved e.p.t. in-home pregnancy test.

So far this year, W-L is testing LiquiSlim fiber/diet aid liquid in St. Louis and Indianapolis test markets and Liquasom liquid nighttime sleep aid in test markets in Alabama, Florida, Georgia and North Carolina.

Following FDA approval last September, W-L is one of four companies expected to introduce its own brand of diazepam, the generic version of Valium. Valium sales were $240 million last year. The generic valium market could hit $100 million in the first year, analysts predict. Hoffmann-La Rouche, marketer of Valium, says it would not seek to compete with the lower-cost, lower-price versions being readied by Mylan Pharmaceuticals, Pittsburgh; Warner-Lambert's Parke-Davis division, and Zenith Laboratories, Northvale, N.J.

The nonprescription drug category continued to boom last year, with the top 10 drug companies holding more than 50% of the $8 billion-plus market. W-L holds about 4%, tied with Schering-Plough, compared with Bristol-Myers, the leader with 9%. Abbott Laboratories is second with 8%; Johnson & Johnson and American Home Products are tied with 6% each.

W-L's healthcare division, divided between ethical and nonprescription products, had an increase of 11% worldwide in nonprescription product sales and 6.8% in ethical products.

Benadryl antihistamine is the company's most successful otc product launch, reaching No. 2 in the allergy medication category by the end of 1985. Formerly a prescription product for 40 years in the Parke-Davis division, Benadryl was introduced in capsule and elixir form last year as an otc allergy medicine, following approval in January for sale without prescription. Spending in network and spot tv and consumer print was $3.5 million.

The company also expanded its presence in the $740 million otc cough/cold market with the introduction of Benylin cough syrup in two forms—a nasal decongestant and an expectorant promoter. Benylin, with $4.8 million in measured media spending in 1985, was the fastest growing major cough syrup in the U.S., advancing to No. 4 in the market.

Mediquell, a chewable cough medicine that W-L claims lasts twice as long as regular-strength liquid cough medicines, received a hefty 28% advertising boost to $9.8 million in measured spending, its first full year of sales. A decongestant formula rolled out in 1985. The brand was moved to Y&R from Bates in June, 1986.

As the $125 million calcium-supplement market continued to grow, W-L went national last August with premium-priced, vanilla-flavored Suplical soft chewy calcium supplement squares, and followed in December with lower-priced, mint-flavored Theracal chewable calcium supplement. Measured spending for Suplical was $2.8 million, via Bates for consumer and Thomas Ferguson Associates, Parsippany, N.J., for medical.

As other players scrambled to gain share in the fledgling calcium supplement market, 60-year-old Tums antacid, from Beecham Products' Norcliff-Thayer unit, muscled in with calcium supplement claims of its own.

Rolaids antacid maintained its 32% market share with an 11% increase in measured media spending in the $400 million antacid category, in which Tums is a notch behind. Renewed activity in the category came from archrival Tums, a Beecham product, repositioned as a calcium supplement. Tums' climb of 8 percentage points was fueled by an estimated $7 million ad campaign and came at the expense of smaller brands. Rolaids supported its regular and sodium-free brands in 1985 with $11.9 million, up 11.2%. Both brands previously were handled by Bates, but moved to Y&R in June.

Rolaids struck at Tums in February, 1986, with a tv campaign claiming a survey revealed that doctors prefered the relief formula in Rolaids over Tums. Analysts say Rolaids is a few share points ahead of Tums. Maalox, from the Rorer Group, is third in the category.

Hoping to capitalize on Rolaids' continued success and its own chewable technology, the company also rolled out Remegel soft, chewable antacid in January, 1986, supported by network tv and spot radio. Bates handled the introductory wave, but the brand moved to JWT in June. Measured media spending for Remegel in test markets last year was $97,500.

Efferdent denture cleaner had $8.3 million in measured spending, up 12%, while Listerine antiseptic mouthwash posted a 13% share gain in the mouthwash category, at the expense of P&G's Scope, on the strength of plaque-reduction claims made in a $15 million ad campaign last year. Sales soared to a record $150 million last year for Listerine brand, and W-L submitted clinical evidence to the FDA and the American Dental Assn. to support the plaque reduction and gingivitis-fighting claims. Measured spending in 1985 was $16.4 million for Listerine antiseptic mouthwash and $7.5 million for Listermint.

Halls cough tablets topped its own sales record at $200 million with a 15% gain in unit sales, bringing its total U.S. market share to more than 50%. Halls, handled by JWT, received $7.8 million in measured spending, up 9.9%.

As the cost of healthcare continues to increase, consumers are turning increasingly to self-diagnostic, in-home tests rather than visiting doctors or clinics. Analysts expect the home diagnostic market to hit $1 billion in sales by 1990, compared with sales of $400 million in 1985.

W-L jumped into the home-test kit market in March, 1985, with Early Detector, a self-administered colorectal test kit that tests for blood in the stool. Early Detector got a boosted print effort in 12 newspapers last July due to publicity surrounding President Reagan's colorectal cancer surgery. Measured media spending last year was $4.1 million. Although Detecatest home kit, made by C.B. Fleet Co., was first on the market in 1984, that company says it was so discouraged by doctors and the American Cancer Society that it did not advertise last year.

The lucrative in-home pregnancy test market is booming, with analysts projecting 20% annual growth rate. Sales of in-home pregnancy tests hit $45 million last year, up 28.6%. Battle for supremacy heated up in 1985 between W-L's e.p.t. brand and Johnson & Johnson's Ortho division, including Daisy 2, Fact and Advance brands. Ortho claimed a combined 40% market share to W-L's combined 36% in March, but by June, W-L's e.p.t. had 50% market share to Ortho's Advance Pregnancy Test's 20% market share.

However, in December, W-L introduced an improved version, e.p.t. plus, with a measured $2.1 million campaign, featuring heavy prime-time and daytime tv and national consumer magazines. E.p.t. brands had 1985 measured ad spending of $3.3 million, via JWT. W-L spent $4.5 million on new e.p.t. plus campaign, with separate healthcare professional effort via Thomas Ferguson Associates.

Lifestyle condoms, one of the few products in the Parke-Davis division to receive advertising support, signed Dr. Ruth Westheimer, the media sex guru, last year. Ads, via JWT, ran only on cable tv and radio, starting in August, 1985. All networks have broadcast bans on condom commercials.

Despite a significant 50% sales increase in disposable razors, the Schick division still is battling it out with French-owned Bic Corp. for second place in the $700 million wet shave market. Schick has a 20% share in dollars, but trails the lower-priced Bic in units sold. Boston-based Gillette is the market leader in shaving with more than 50% in unit and dollar sales.

Schick spokesmen Joe Montana was replaced in April by an animated beard as Schick launched its Super 2 Plus, a double bonded razor entry with a "lubricating strip."

The $5 million advertising assault was a direct response to Gillette's Atra Plus introduction, via a $7 million campaign last year. Schick also spent $5.9 million for Schick disposables and shaving products.

Sales of gums and mints, accounting for 20% of corporate sales, were down 2% in 1985. Breath mints and the weakening of the U.S. dollar accounted for a majority of the gain.

The decline in sales of 1.4% followed 1984's 2% increase in sales over 1983, the only gain for gum and mint sales since 1981. This year's decline prompted the replacement of John Carroll as president of the American Chicle division by John Walsh. Mr. Walsh, former vp-product manager for W-L's consumer health products group, is charged with reviving profits for the division.

Sticklets rolled nationally last year, supported by $8.4 million in measured media spending in tv and radio. Tag line for the brand is "Skinny Sticklets, fat with flavor." Spending is up nearly 95% from test market spending the year before. It competes in the sugared stick gum segment, which accounts for 40% of the $3 billion worldwide chewing gum sales.

After an 18% ad spending increase in 1984 to combat Wm. Wrigley's aspartame-sweetened Extra gum, Trident sugarless gum and mints' ad spending dropped 12% to $15.5 million. Product reformulation helped Trident maintain its No. 1 position in the sugarless gum category, with $95 million in U.S. sales.

Wendy's International faced several tough tasks in 1985 as it tried to duplicate the phenomenal success it enjoyed in 1984, when its name and its "Where's the beef?" advertising catch phrase were constantly in the news. The discontinuation of the use of actress Clara Peller as advertising "spokeswoman" made that more difficult, as did the increased ad spending levels by Wendy's two larger competitors, McDonald's and Burger King.

Despite increasing its own total ad spending 15.1% from 1984, Wendy's remained outspent by those competitors, especially by McDonald's Corp., which spent $550 million in the U.S. The estimated $100 million McDonald's spent on advertising and promotions just to introduce its McD.L.T. sandwich almost equaled Wendy's total ad/promotion budget for the year.

Wendy's had to battle not only its competitors but also a general sales slump that affected much of the fast food industry in 1985. Systemwide (company and franchised) sales for the Wendy's chain rose 11% to $2.69 billion in 1985, a respectable showing, but less than half the 26% sales increase registered in 1984. The number of Wendy's units operating worldwide increased 15% to 3,442 at the end of 1985.

Systemwide average per-unit sales at Wendy's, which in 1984 had jumped 13% to $861,000, slid 1.5% in 1985 to $848,000.

The end of Clara Peller's reign as Wendy's spokeswoman came in March, 1985, when she began appearing in tv commercials for Campbell Soup Co.'s Prego spaghetti sauce. In that commercial, the 4-ft., 11-in. octogenarian was shown cradling a giant jar of the sauce and repeating "I finally found it!" A voiceover added "Real beef—it's in there."

At first, Wendy's officials were philosophical, saying Ms. Peller's appearance for Prego probably would sell more Wendy's hamburgers. Then they became serious and decided not to sign the actress to a new contract. It was a bad blow for both Ms. Peller, who had earned an estimated $500,000 from her association with the chain, and Wendy's, which lost the services of an advertising phenomenon who had propelled the chain to record sales and earnings in 1984.

With Clara gone, Wendy's tried several different advertising approachs and introduced several new products in an effort to retain its high advertising-awareness levels. Sticking with director Joe Sedelmaier, who had created the "Where's the beef?" campaign, Wendy's produced new commercials—titled "Wine cellar" and "12 o'clock"—that stressed its food is freshly prepared to order.

In line with its longtime positioning as an "adult" fast food chain, Wendy's has given more attention to its salad bar menu than have other chains (Burger King discontinued advertising support for its salads; McDonald's has concentrated on packaged salads). Last summer, Wendy's salad menu was expanded to include more seasonal fruits and pasta and was backed by a six-week "Light Menu" campaign.

Hot dogs are another menu item that few fast food chains offer, but Wendy's has been trying to fill the void with expanded testing of its Great American hot dog. The hot dogs are being tested in 600 stores in several markets.

In July, Wendy's made its most significant marketing decision of the year, adding a breakfast menu throughout its system. Breakfast pioneers Hardee's and McDonald's have convinced consumers that a fast food restaurant can provide a satisfying morning meal, and breakfast now accounts for up to 20% of some chains' sales.

Wendy's decided to offer more "traditional" breakfast fare than other chains. Rather than concentrate on breakfast "sandwiches" like McDonald's Egg McMuffin, Wendy's offered more platters, such as scrambled eggs and French toast.

A major introductory ad campaign backed the breakfast launch, but the menu didn't take hold at many of its stores. Nine months after the launch, Wendy's was forced to back off from its commitment to breakfast and make the morning meal an option rather than requirement for its franchise-operated stores. Analysts ascribed the disappointing results for the breakfast rollout largely to the general sales slump that gripped the industry in 1985.

Wendy's returned in September to its strongest sales pitch—freshness of ingredients—with a major campaign themed "Choose fresh. Choose Wendy's." Exec vp marketing William Welter called the freshness approach "an equity we see ourselves owning through the '80s" and "the Achilles' heel of our competition."

Continuing to vary its creative approaches, Wendy's followed the "Choose fresh" campaign with another Sedelmaier commercial, "Fashion Show," which won awards at the 1985 Cannes festival. The spot depicts a Soviet fashion show in which the clothing being modeled remains the same and only accessories change.

A campaign planned for spring of 1986 was scrapped when independent director Mark Story, who had filmed the spots, showed rough versions of the commercials to a San Diego advertising club before they were to air. Angered with Mr. Story and agency DFS-Dorland, New York, Wendy's pulled the plug on the campaign.

In June, 1986, Wendy's launched another major new product with another twist to its advertising mix. The introduction of Crispy Chicken Nuggets was backed by a full-scale campaign (tv, print, point-of-purchase) from Lockhart & Pettus, New York, Wendy's black-consumer agency. L&P's "Celebrate" campaign, featuring pop group Kool & the Gang, was the first general market, fast food campaign to be produced in total by a minority-owned agency.

An important but often overlooked change in marketing strategy for Wendy's has been its decision to fight for a larger share of the children's market. It still does not have a large enough tv ad budget to afford network tv buys during Saturday mornings—a media daypart McDonald's has owned with its $300 million tv budget—but Wendy's is not giving up. For the past two years, the chain has attempted to increase the quality of the in-pack premium items in its children's meal boxes and consider menu items—such as hot dogs and chicken nuggets—with high appeal for children.

The push for better children's meal marketing began in 1985 with The Good Stuff gang, a series of characters created especially for the chain. Subsequently, Wendy's has joined the licensed-character bandwagon with promotions tied to Walt Disney Co.'s Gummi Bear characters and with Tonka's GoBots transformable robots.

Burger King, which many years ago gave up on trying to establish a Burger King character on Saturday mornings, began following a similar path in 1986 with a children's meal promotion tied to the "Thunder Cats" characters. But Ronald McDonald's dominance in the children's market appears likely to continue.

Wendy's continues its efforts to build a stronger international presence. In 1985 the company expanded its foreign store total to 201, compared with 177 in 1984. In July, 1986, Wendy's gave up on the competitive British market, agreeing to sell its 16-store U.K. subsidiary to British brewer Whitbread & Co. plc.

Wendy's Sisters Chicken & Biscuits subsidiary was given new advertising in 1985. Tv, radio and print ads for the 79-store chain were themed "You've never had it this good." Measured media spending for Sisters was $1 million in 1985. The company intends to open an additional 16 Sisters units by the end of 1986.

The successful launch of Extra sugar-free gum helped Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co., Chicago, turn in record sales and maintain about 45% of U.S. chewing gum sales in 1985.

Wrigley began rolling out Extra sugar-free gum with NutraSweet brand sweetener in mid-1984 and added Extra bubble gum early last year. The company backed the introductions with about $16 million in ad spending, making Extra second only to Spearmint in Wrigley ad support.

Over-all, the company increased its total ad spending 16% to $81.5 million, up from $70.4 million in 1984. Once again, the bulk of Wrigley's ad spending went into network tv—$48 million. Spot tv had $19 million.

Network radio spending, which fell from $3 million in 1983 to less than $1 million in 1984, increased slightly to about $1.3 million. Spending in magazines, a medium used for the first time in 1984, increased slightly to $2.4 million, while cable tv received $3.6 million.

Net earnings for 1985 were up 9.7%, and worldwide sales grew by 5%, returns the company attributes primarily to fast-growing sales of Extra and selected price increases.

Extra's shining performance—within 18 months of its introduction it held about 25% of the growing sugarless gum segment—offset slight unit volume decreases for the company's traditional big three brands, Spearmint, Doublemint and Juicy Fruit.

Extra is expected to finish this year as the No. 2 brand of sugarfree chewing gum, surpassing RJR/Nabisco's Care*free to trail only American Chicle's Trident, which has an estimated 40% share of the sugarfree market. The sugarfree segment makes up about 30% of the $2.8 billion U.S. chewing gum market.

The Extra campaign, which covers both the chewing gum and bubble gum, consisted almost entirely of network and spot tv buys. Themed "Extra lasts extra long," it is handled by BBDO, Chicago, Wrigley's primary agency.

In 1985, the company spent less than $2 million on measured media through Needham Harper Worldwide, Chicago, which handles Wrigley's faltering Hubba Bubba bubble gum and brands marketed by its Amurol Products Co. division. Wrigley is trying to stimulate Hubba Bubba with a cola-flavored extension. Tests are under way in the South. A NutraSweet-enhanced sugarfree Hubba Bubba in regular and grape flavors is, also in the South.

The only brand from Amurol, which markets novelty candy items, that received significant ad support in 1985 was Big League Chew, a shredded bubble gum packaged in a pouch similar to chewing tobacco. Big League Chew was backed by $670,000 in tv support.

Despite introducing several new products to take up the slack of waning faddish products, Amurol's revenues fell below the record levels of the previous two years.

In January, Amurol introduced Poke 'M Out the Back candies, packaged so they can be popped out of their casings into the air.

Spearmint's spending zoomed from a little more than $12 million to $21.5 million in support of a new campaign, themed "Get a little lift," that was launched in midyear. That increase made Spearmint by far the most advertised Wrigley brand, supplanting Doublemint, which received $15.5 million in ad support. Spearmint holds an estimated 10% market share.

In 1984, Doublemint spending was $14.5 million compared with $12.2 million for Spearmint.

Wrigley continued its "Double your pleasure" campaign for Doublemint that was updated in 1984. Doublemint remains the world's No. 1 gum brand with an estimated 15% market share.

There were no changes in the Juicy Fruit campaign, themed "The taste that's gonna move ya," which was launched in 1983. It received about $8 million in ad support.

Big Red, a cinnamon-flavored gum, posted its fifth straight year of volume gain, making it a more promising performer than any of Wrigley's big three brands.

Spending for the Big Red campaign, themed "Long lasting breath freshness," dropped slightly from $8 million to $7.7 million, all on tv.

Freedent, whose selling point is that is doesn't stick to most dental work, was the only brand other than Extra and Doublemint advertised in magazines, presumably because its benefits require a more detailed explanation. Wrigley spent slightly more than $4 million on Freedent advertising, which is themed "The one that takes the stick out of gum."

At this year's annual meeting, shareholders approved antitakover measures that bolstered Wrigley family control in the event of a hostile buyout bid. Nearly 40% of the company's stock is owned by family members and company officers.

The move allows the company to issue new common shares to finance internal growth or acquisitions without diluting the holding of the Wrigley family.

The company also announced a three-for-one stock split and it would begin paying regular quarterly dividends of 24 cents a share on the basis of the current shares outstanding. Previously, the company paid monthly dividends of 5 cents per share.

The industrywide softness in the office equipment market experience by Xerox Corp. in 1985 has continued into the first half of 1986, making Xerox's purchase in 1982 of insurance subsidiary, Crum & Forster, look better each quarter.

Xerox, which got only a 0.1% increase to $6.59 billion from its reprographics segment in 1985—or 56% of total company revenues—suffered a plunge in profit from its major business lines of 28% in the second quarter this year, following a first quarter drop of 59% in the category, but could take solace from an improved performance in the company's financial services sector.

Xerox reported that for the second quarter, because of sharply higher profits in finance—led by its insurance subsidiary, Crum & Forster—income from continuing operations grew by 13%.

Financial services accounted for $62 million of the quarter's net income figure of $122 million; the $62 million, an increase of 229%.

Much of this came from higher premium costs, what a company spokesman calls "flow through" of higher prices that C&F put into effect in early 1985. "It's not unusual for a corporation that was paying $100,000 for an insurance policy last year to be paying perhaps a million now," says Julian Menear, an analyst with the Pershing division of Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette. He adds that financial services is "about the only strong point in the company [Xerox] right now as a whole."

Xerox, best known for copiers that command about 36% of the market over largely Japanese rivals, Canon, Sharp and Ricoh, has brought about a dramatic turnaround at Crum & Forster, a company that had losses from continuing operations just two years ago of $5 million. Income from continuing operations in 1985 was $29 million for the insurance unit and, according to spokesman Peter Hawes, $114 million through the second quarter of this year.

In the first half, 1986, Xerox had earnings from continuing operations of $237 million, down 4%, and net income of $223 million, down from $334 million a year earlier when the publishing unit sale and a tax settlement boosted results. Revenue was $4.32 billion, up 6.4%. Some analysts believe Xerox misread the market, because it increased research spending 14% and selling and administrative expenses 13% and beefed up its work force heading into the new fiscal year.

Melvin Howard, in August, 1986, was named a vice chairman of Xerox. He is considered the chief architect of the company's diversification into the financial services field and will continue to be president of Xerox Financial Services and chairman-ceo, C&F. At the same time, Paul A. Allaire was named president. He will be responsible for office equipment and computer sectors.

The name Xerox has been synonymous with copiers, but the company is involved in areas far and wide from copying and financial services. It announced recently the formation of a software systems business, ParcPlace, which includes the Smalltalk-80 system, a development in "artificial intelligence" in use since 1983 in research universities and corporations.

Xerox's Sandy Lanzarotta explains that the user friendly programs emulate the thought patterns of their human operators. "The system," he adds, "intuits how it is you're going about thinking of things. You can develop software programs that, in a sense, identify with the people who are working with the computer."

Xerox is also involved with a process that transfers X-rays to hard copy, and this has applications for an early prognosis of breast cancer. Its xeroradiography is also touted as providing dentists with highly detailed X-ray pictures.

To promote and sell it all, Xerox reported to the SEC it spent $176.5 million in advertising worldwide in 1985, an increase of 2.1% from the year before. Xerox says it follows the SEC definition of advertising costs, which includes spending for the in-house advertising department; developing campaigns; printing and distributing sales literature, brochures and other marketing materials.

Measured media indices for Xerox show it spent $60.3 million, about the same as in the prior year—$24.8 million of it on network tv. Leading National Advertisers' seven-media total for general promotion in 1985 is $21.6 million; for business machines, $14.7 million. Crum & Forster's ad spending totaled $614,000, with $354,000 of that going to magazine advertising for personal insurance.

Xerox surprised Madison Avenue earlier this year when it chose Lowe Marschalk for its direct marketing. Xerox had been working with agencies much larger than Lowe Marschalk in direct marketing.

And Xerox shocked the ad world with its notice in March that it was taking its $40 million in ad business from the New York office of Needham Harper Worldwide, its lead agency. Ted Bates got the account. Says Xerox's Peter Hawes, a spokesman, "The thrust of it, really, was that we were ready for a change."

Xerox also says it will make changes to cope with the intense competition of the Japanese, a dominaticn of the personal computer field (which Xerox was falsely rumored to be getting out of this year) by IBM and Apple among others, and the shifting sands of the high-stakes insurance business.

Xerox officials also are confident it will develop better software and computer systems that will operate more and more, although never completely, like the human brain.

AUTO BOOMERANG?

Promotion pros decry finance ploys

By PAUL L. EDWARDS

Detroit's low-lower-lowest interest-rate sales hypes have touched off a great debate between seasoned sales-promotion leaders and the auto industry's best sales and marketing talent.

The debate centers around the question: What happens when the offers expire next month, when the 1987 model year cars arrive en masse? Will there still be buyers in the marketplace for the new cars? Or will Detroit's auto makers find that their most costly promotion ever did little more than shift fourth-quarter sales ahead one month?

While the U.S. auto makers' unprecedented low-cost financing has met with initial success, some industry observers argue that such dramatic promotional practices actually might have outlived their usefulness as a marketing tool.

General Motors Corp.'s offer of 2.9% financing (AA, Sept. 1) already has become the most successful sales ploy in its history. With an unmanageable 79-day inventory of unsold cars, imports continuing to capture a significant share of sales and a public growing jaded by a steady diet of financing offers and accompanying rebates, GM saw little choice but to become the first auto maker to crack the 3% financing barrier.

Toyota to hike ad budget by 30%

TORRANCE, CAL.—Toyota Motor Sales USA will pump up its U.S. ad budget by 20% to 30%, to $200 million-plus, in the 1987 model year as it introduces four all-new cars. Introductory ads break in the first week of October from DDB Needham Worldwide, Los Angeles.

Hush Puppies again sniffing for agency

ROCKFORD, MICH.—Wolverine World Wide will start reviewing agencies "soon" for its $3 million-to-$4 million Hush Puppies footwear account. The move follows a split with DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, over "differences in creative philosophy," said Richard Simpson, Wolverine director-advertising and human relations. The decision to part was mutual, he added. Needham won the account last October (AA, Oct. 10).

CBS to sign $65M college football pact

NEW YORK—The College Football Assn. this week will sign a four-year, $65 million-plus tv rights agreement with CBS. It takes effect during the 1987 season. Separately, the Atlantic Coast Conference, University of Miami, Army and Navy will rejoin the CFA, sources said. ABC, which now televises the CFA, will air Big Ten and Pac-10 games in '87.

Bates' top exec shift surprise for Zuckert

By STEWART ALTER

Robert Jacoby's management shakeup at Ted Bates Worldwide last week put John Hoyne and John Nichols in the spotlight as the new generation of leaders at the billion dollar agency.

But it reportedly was also an unpleasant surprise for Ted Bates Advertising/New York president Donald Zuckert, who was moved by Mr. Jacoby into a new post apparently without prior consultation: Vice-chairman-senior corporate administrative officer of Bates Worldwide. Mr. Hoyne becomes the No. 2-ranking exec at Bates, after Mr. Jacoby, as president-chief operating officer. Mr. Jacoby, 58, who had held the president's title, remains chairman-ceo.

Mr. Nichols replaced Mr. Zuckert as chief of Bates/New York.

It was the first major leadership change since Mr. Jacoby consolidated his position as chairman/president/ceo 13 years ago.

Sources at Bates said Mr. Zuckert quickly distributed an internal memo after the announcement in

Highlights

Will '87 auto buyers lose interest? 1

Detroit's low-lower-lowest interest-rate sales hypes have touched off a great debate between seasoned sales-promotion leaders and the auto industry's best sales and marketing talent. The debate centers around the question: What happens when the offers expire next month, when the 1987 model year cars arrive en masse?

Hoyne assumes big role at Bates 1

John Hoyne has been named president-chief operating officer of Ted Bates Worldwide in the agency's first major leadership change since Robert Jacoby consolidated his position as chairman/president/ceo 13 years ago.

Crest seeking famous smile 3

Procter & Gamble's Crest toothpaste may be in for a celebrity brushup. Sources say P&G is actively searching for a celebrity—preferably a tv newscaster or well known science personality—to be the new spokesman for its category-leading dentifrice.

Vie de France perks up 4

Vie de France's wanderings from its fresh-croissant origins have been supported by little advertising, marketing savvy or, as the bottom line shows, much success. So the arrival of Richard Sharoff from Kitchens of Sara Lee as heir apparent to the presidency of the company is a sweet surprise.

Ward takes local focus 12

Montgomery Ward & Co., which recently moved to split its $5.39 billion operation into separate apparel and home/automotive groups, also is transforming its advertising strategy from broad-based national campaigns to specialty efforts in local markets.

FEATURES

Everybody wants to get into the act 40

Actor Richard Kuhlman.

For actors desperate to break into commercials, aggressive tactics sometimes seem necessary. Getting the chance to appear in a spot is a coup for actors otherwise competing against legions of hopefuls seeking the big break. Rarely do actors set out to make a career hawking soft drinks and laundry detergent. But when Paramount Pictures or ABC-TV doesn't call, most view commercial acting as a lucrative source of income and an opportunity to hone their craft. It beats waiting tables, delivering pizzas or parking cars.

INTERNATIONAL

What's going on in Latin America? 58

In the August edition of Quatro Rodas, Brazil's version of Car & Driver, there are no automotive ads. But the issue still carries 87 ad pages, 10% more than the same issue last year. The automobile companies in Mexico aren't advertising either. Instead, they are giving away houses and other big prizes to salesmen who sell the most cars. The strange Latin American advertising market—particularly the two biggest markets in the region, Brazil and Mexico—has rarely been as confusing to U.S. observers as it is now.

Crossroad

MTV grows up as Pittman exits

By LARRY G. COLLINS

New York—MTV Networks is standing at so many crossroads that it is drawing a road map for the entire post-takeover tv industry.

It is losing one of its founders, president-ceo Robert Pittman, who last week announced he will leave next year to start his own entertainment company with MCA.

Both Mr. Pittman and Kenneth Gorman, chairman of parent company Viacom International's Viacom Networks Group, express confidence in existing MTV Networks management, but neither would state that a new president would not be recruited from outside.

MTVN also is transforming itself from an irreverent start-up operation that quickly influenced media, arts and even social trends into an established corporation that has to beat last-year and last-quarter results. So far, it is doing well enough to satisfy the bottom-line-oriented Viacom.

Viacom itself presents another crossroad for MTVN since it acquired the company last November after a management-led group, including Mr. Pittman, attempted a leveraged buyout. In buying MTVN, Viacom acquired—in addition to MTV—VH-1, the adult-oriented video music channel, and Nickelodeon, the channel that features children's programing by day and "Nick at Nite" family-oriented fare in the evenings.

This corporate marriage appears to be bucking the examples of Soybean group raps rapeseed in New Puritan

By JUDANN DAGNOLI

The nation's soybean producers are lashing Procter & Gamble for taking the soybeans out of Puritan oil.

P&G has reformulated Puritan from a soybean/sunflower blend to low erucic acid rapeseed oil (lear). It reformulated Puritan (AA, Aug. 4) after the federal government approved the new oil, unofficially called canola oil, for use as a food.

The American Soybean Assn. alleges P&G is making "inflated health claims" for New Puritan. ASA officials have met several times with the Cincinnati-based company to urge a switch back to soybean oil, said association president David Haggard.

The St. Louis-based ASA charges that "positioning this [New Puritan] as a healthful, premium product is misleading to consumers" because it has a lower level of polyunsaturates than the old formula even though it does have a more desired lower level of saturated fat.

Although P&G earlier said it

Kenwood to KC

Kenwood Stereo Systems, Carson, Cal., hired Kresser, Craig/D.I.K., Los Angeles, for its $2 million account following a review that also included Evans/Weinberg, Phillips-Ramsey and Ramey Communications, all Los Angeles. KC recently lost the competing Alpine Electronics of America business (AA, Aug. 11), following a management shakeup. Hakuhodo Advertising, Los Angeles, is the former agency.

Williams-Sonoma Inc., San Francisco, named Lowe Marschalk, San Francisco, its first agency. Advertising will support the company's 60 upscale housewares retail outlets. Initial print ads back the opening of six stores. At present, the budget is less than $500,000.

The copy in this July 4 ad celebrating Lady Liberty's 100th birthday reads, in part: "Today, on her nation's birthday, even in the shadow of her torch, homeless Americans go hungry." Cheers to Campbell Soup Co. and Lewis, Gilman & Kynett, Philadelpha, for noting what everyone else seemed to ignore amid the fanfare and hype of Liberty Weekend 1986. Creative director: Jacqueline Lowell; copywriters: Jacqueline Lowell, Terese Zeccardi; art director: Lori Miller.

This ad, created by Beber Silverstein & Partners, Miami, for Knight-Ridder, also in Miami, uses a strong visual, in this case a news photo, and a strong headline to point up the editorial quality of the company's newspapers. Creative director: Russ Slaughter; copywriter: Bob Beers; art director: Rich Chmiel.

When the local "Baby Bell" phone company in New York (Nynex) chose to omit its Yellow Pages competitor—Southwestern Bell Media—from its own Yellow Pages, Southwestern Bell ran this "repair" kit ad via Gardner Advertising, St. Louis, to set the record straight. Group creative director: Steve Puckett; copywriter: Tom Townsend; art director: Paul Behnen; illustrator: Bill Nelson.

June ads jump 18%

New York—Advertiser investments in the major market daily newspapers measured for the Advertising Age Flash Report climbed to $310.7 million in June, an 18% increase from a year ago.

The gains were fueled by a major increase in airline ad spending, which soared 80.2% to $17.8 million, and by strong increases in the amusements and department stores categories, with amusements ad spending up 28.4% to $34.8 million and department-store ad spending up 9.4% to $95.5 million.

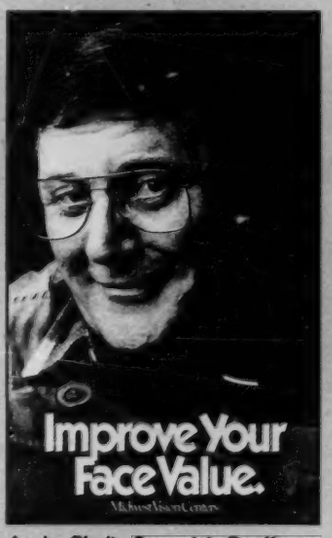
Among other categories posting strong gains were food stores, up 14.5% to $32.6 million; radio-tv-phonograph-record dealers, up 17.3% to $20.2 million; general-merchandise stores, up 15.9% to $46.2 million, and public service utilities and commissions, up 71.6% to $10 million.

Categories also showing increases were new passenger-car dealers, up 22.5% to $19 million; banks and trust companies, up 25.4% to $7.8 million, and stock, bond and investment houses, up 72.1% to $2.3 million.

The only categories posting losses from June, '85, levels were computer stores and supplies, down 11.9% to $4.5 million and publishing and media, down 3.7% to $9 million.

The Flash Report is prepared for Advertising Age by Media Records Inc. here, based on measurements of advertising in 29 daily and 23 Sunday newspapers in 15 major markets.#

A great marriage of headline and illustration is the captivating element of this ad for North Memorial Medical Center's Cosmetic Surgery unit, from Clarity Coverdale Rueff, Minneapolis. Art director: David Fox; copywriter: Jerry Fury; photographer: Tom Berthiaume.



Again, Clarity Coverdale Rueff uses a good illustration and a simple, straightforward headline to cut through the clutter of eyecare advertising for client Midwest Vision Centers. Art director: David Fox; copywriter: Jerry Fury; photographer: Marc Hauser.

Best of Press selections are made by Hank Simons, vp-creative director of the Newspaper Advertising Bureau; James Dunaway, vp-information at the bureau, and William F. Gloede, Ad Age newspaper industry reporter. National System Inc., St. Louis, provides tear sheets. Agencies, clients and newspapers are invited to submit ads for review. This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. All publisher supplied figures are converted to MRCS SAU inches by Media Records. These newspapers are indicated with an asterisk (*).

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in linage but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in Inches.
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches.
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches).
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page.
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches

P&G trims Saatchi sails

Merger penalty: 4 brands, $85M

By STEWART ALTER and LAURIE FREEMAN

In a slap at the Saatchi & Saatchi autonomous agency network system, Procter & Gamble, the No. 1 ad spender, has rewarded agencies untouched by mergers and acquisitions by pulling $85 million in billings from the No. 1 agency network.

P&G also demonstrated, as it reassigned four brands from Saatchi agencies, that it was standing firm against appeals that it modify its U.S. "divisional" account-conflict policy.

Following what was reportedly six months of on-and-off discussions dating back to Saatchi's "loan" deal with Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, P&G rejected a final appeal from chairman Maurice Saatchi in a visit to Cincinnati about two weeks ago.

Building competing autonomous networks has become central to Saatchi's strategy, as well as that of

With Laurence Tisch's stunning assault on CBS, control of all three networks has changed hands in the past year.

Tisch easy winner in CBS takeover

By VERNE GAY

New York—CBS Inc., buffeted by hostile takeover bids, slumping prime time ratings, a disenchanted news operation and nagging doubts about top management, finally has the answer to its most pressing question: What is Laurence Tisch going to do?

For starters, Mr. Tisch last week ousted CBS chairman-ceo Thomas Wyman as he carried out one of the most brilliant takeovers ever. Mr. Wyman made it easier for Mr. Tisch when he disclosed at the Sept. 10 board meeting that he had been trying to interest Coca-Cola Co. in buying CBS. The directors apparently were stunned by this unilateral move on Mr. Wyman's part. Soon after, he resigned.

Immediately, morale in the CBS newsroom rebounded. The company is no longer "in play," or considered vulnerable to hostile acquisition. And the company avoided a lengthy and costly takeover fight that could have set off untold regulatory problems had Mr. Tisch gone beyond his

Lead clients to creativity, Jacoby urges

By JENNIFER PENDLETON

Incline Village, Nev.—American Assn. of Advertising Agencies chairman Robert Jacoby thinks U.S. advertising agencies have abdicated creative leadership to their clients and he wants to do something about it.

In a speech to the western region conference of the Four A's here, the chairman, president and ceo of Ted Bates Worldwide outlined a three-point program he will propose to the Four A's aimed at lifting advertising out of what he perceives as a creative malaise.

The objective is "to come to grips, once and for all, with the industry's priority need—a means of pinpointing the value of a truly creative advertising campaign—in terms of sales and market-share performance," Mr. Jacoby said.

The points include:

- Finding the best marketing minds in academia to develop a comprehensive plan to isolate and quantify the effectiveness of advertising campaigns.
- Selection of a blue-ribbon group of advertising professionals from both agencies and clients to work with academic leaders and to oversee the execution of the study.
- Funding the study through contributions from Four A's member agencies.

Mr. Jacoby emphasized he wants his proposed study to evaluate campaigns, not commercials, saying "the cumulative effect of advertising is the only effect that

Antidrug psas from 4A's coming this fall

Incline Village, Nev.—Public service announcements created as part of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies' massive antidrug crusade are likely to be on the air after the November elections, Four A's president Leonard Matthews last week told the group's western region convention here. The Four A's has convinced Hollywood labor unions to allow talent to appear in the spots without demanding that sponsors contribute to the unions' pension funds, an unprecedented move.

GM plans 2.6% price hikes for '87 models

Detroit—General Motors will increase average prices of its 1987 model cars by 2.6% over comparably equipped '86 models. But GM will slice $601 from the price of the 1987 Chevrolet Chevette, an 11% drop to $4,995, as the No. 1 car maker tries to compete with a spate of new imports aimed at

P&G pulls brands from Saatchi 1
Procter & Gamble, rejecting appeals to modify its U.S. conflict policy, last week withdrew $85 million in billings from Saatchi & Saatchi Co. and reassigned four brands to agencies untouched by mergers and acquisitions.

Tisch makes his play for CBS 1
CBS Inc., buffeted by hostile takeover bids, slumping prime time ratings, a disenchanted news operation and nagging doubts about top management, finally has the answer to its most pressing question: What is Laurence Tisch going to do?

General Mills adds muscle 4
General Mills has spent the past year selling or spinning off nearly all its nonfood holdings, strengthening major food brands, entering more food categories, restructuring the food group's management and revamping its restaurants. The result is giving new vigor to a company that long has been a dominant force in the food industry.

Opportunity rings for Cohen 6
A poolside telephone call from Richard Avedon was the catalyst for a chain of events that led Arthur Cohen to take over as exec vp-advertising for Revlon.

'Parenting's' parents an unlikely match 45
A most improbable couple is making progress toward becoming the proud parents of Parenting. Few in the magazine industry would have believed that giant Time Inc., perceived as a bastion of bureaucracy, would join forces with a San Francisco-based female entrepreneur to start a special-interest publication. But it has.

IBM clashes with clones 52
Scrambling to fight off fierce low-cost competition from clones of its 5-year-old Personal Computer, IBM now faces a struggle at the high end of the market from a new generation of powerful desktop machines. Leading the assault is Compaq Computer Corp.

Will others follow Trojan breakthrough? 108
Carter-Wallace this month breaks a massive print campaign for market leader Trojan prophylactics that will run in several national magazines that never before accepted condom advertising. The multi-million-dollar campaign is expected to pave the way for other condom marketers to advertise in once-forbidden women's and men's magazines. It could lead to the elimination of network tv's long-standing refusal to air contraceptive commercials.

Toyota revs up for '87 110
Toyota Motor Sales shifts into high gear next month with new-car introductions and a much bigger ad budget. The company is betting its four all-new models plus record ad spending will lengthen its lead in the crowded 1987 import auto market.

INTERNATIONAL

Saatchi has direct ideas overseas 70
Saatchi & Saatchi's plan to open a full-service direct-marketing agency in the U.K. this year is a step toward expanding its direct-marketing network internationally. Unlike agencies such as Young & Rubicam and Ogilvy & Mather, Saatchi has not yet attempted to tackle direct marketing on a global basis. The company has targeted direct-marketing services for growth, but remains weak in the area outside the U.S.

Jack in Box pops away from HCM

By BRIAN LOWRY

Jack in the Box has pulled its $25 million account from HCM, Chicago, after a 10-month spin and moved to Cohen/Johnson, a small Los Angeles shop whose principals previously worked on the account.

An 11-person agency founded only 16 months ago, Cohen/Johnson will add at least 20 staffers by mid-November to handle the new business, said chairman-creative director Howie Cohen.

Dale Landaman, managing director of HCM, acknowledged the loss would result in layoffs, particularly in Los Angeles, where HCM had staffed up to serve the account (AA, Nov. 25). He said the agency "hopes to find places for the best people."

"We were never able to agree on a longer-term strategy" beyond discounting promotions, Mr. Landaman said of HCM's brief relationship with the San Diego-based fast-food marketer.

HCM won the account after a lengthy review (AA, Oct. 28) following a leveraged management buyout of the company from Ralston Purina Co., St. Louis.

The account previously was with Wells, Rich, Greene/West, Los Angeles, for eight years.

Another casualty of last week's move was Victor Elkind, adver-

Tues. Teamers form new shop

By STEWART ALTER

NEW YORK—Joining other senior agency executives who see new opportunities in the megamerger era, four top creative and marketing officers from Ally Gargano/MCA Advertising and FCB/Leber Katz Partners have formed an agency of their own.

The new shop, called Messner, Vetere, Berger, Carey, emerges from the "environment for change" created by the wave of mergers and acquisitions, said Ron Berger, 36, who was senior vp-creative director of Ally Gargano/MCA Advertising.

Mr. Berger, along with Tom Messner, 42, and Barry Vetere, 43, all worked at Ally & Gargano before it merged to form AG/MCA. Messrs. Messner and Vetere, who were two of A&G's three top creative executives, had joined Walter Carey, 45, formerly exec vp-associate director, marketing planning at FCB/LKP, to form Tuesday Team II (AA, July 28, et seq.). That ad hoc agency's name reflects its work on the original Tuesday Team, the loose group of agency superstars that developed advertising to reelect President Reagan in 1984, on which Mr. Carey was chief operating officer.

All four will be partners in the Messner agency, housed at 485 Madison Ave. It expects to have $20 million to $25 million in billings within the next three months.

Fox in shop search?

Twentieth Century Fox Television, Los Angeles, the tv syndication arm of Rupert Murdoch's entertainment company, may open a review for its first agency before the end of the year, sources say. The division, reorganizing after the departure of vp-creative services Jerry Greenberg, currently uses various agencies for projects.

Pacific Bell, San Francisco, on Oct. 15 begins a nine-part soap opera-type campaign. The series features a continuing story of two older men speaking to each other on the phone. The two each love the same woman and the catch is, who gets the girl? Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, handles.

Fromm & Sichel, Santa Rosa, Cal., will break a national print and outdoor campaign for Christian Brothers brandy in Bon Appetit, Glamour and other upscale publications in mid-October. Ads play off the way the brandy sometimes is ordered in bars as "CB." Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco, handles.

Raging Waters, San Dimas, Cal., an aquatic amusement park, is contacting Southern California agencies concerning the creative portion of its estimated $1 million-plus account. Adams McMillan, Carlsbad, Cal., will continue to handle media buying.

California Milk Advisory Board, Modesto, will introduce Vital 15, a low-fat, high-calcium milk drink aimed at women, in San Diego this week with $1.2 million in ad support. Theme is "Vital 15: Nutrition designed for a woman's body." McCann-Erickson, San Francisco, handles.

Ad study uncovers spending patterns

CHICAGO—The 1986 edition of Ads Forecasts, the tenth annual research report on advertising expenditures, has been released by Pansophic Systems.

The study shows advertising-to-sales ratios, advertising-to-gross margin ratios and advertising growth rates for each industry in 1985, by SIC category. In addition, it forecasts 1986 and 1987 advertising spending by category and for more than 4,000 individual companies and 280 industries; rates advertising effectiveness for each company and industry listed, and measures ad-spending stability. The study, formerly produced by Schoenfeld & Associates, was included in Pansophic's February acquisition of that software company's assets. Pansophic is one of the largest independent software companies in the world.

Shown at right is the table listing average '85 ratios by industry. The study cautions, however, that within many industry sectors, individual companies may spend significantly more or less than the average.

The raw data for the study were compiled from 10-K reports filed by publicly owned companies with the Securities & Exchange Commission. Therefore, advertising expenditures include both media spending and nonmedia expenditures such as collateral literature and production. For this reason, these figures often are substantially larger than figures from media auditing services.

In some categories, the figures may include substantial nonmedia advertising, such as catalog advertising by retailers, point-of-purchase advertising in alcoholic beverages and direct mail in financial services.

Because data for the study were compiled from published financial statements rather than surveys, cautious interpretation is required for several reasons. Companies may vary in what they include under advertising expenditures. Also, many large companies are in several fields, yet are listed in only their primary industry sector. Distortion may also result because a large subsidiary may not be included in the industry in which it competes. Finally, a few large companies are privately held and their figures are not included.

In the section of the study that includes the 1987 ad-spending forecast, Procter & Gamble is predicted to hold its role as the top ad spender in 1987 with $1.3 billion—slightly ahead of Philip Morris Cos. at $1.2 billion.

General Motors and Sears, Roebuck & Co. are both projected by Ads Forecasts to top the $1 billion mark, and Unilever and Ford Motor Co. are expected to come in just under that figure.

In 1987, food companies will lead all industries in ad spending with $5.1 billion, the survey projects. Retail department stores will take second place with $4.6 billion, followed by motor vehicles at $3.8 billion.

Major new industries—retail mobile home dealers and freight forwarding—will emerge as large advertising spenders in the next few years, with an ad growth rate of 54.6% and 39.4%, respectively, the study reports.

Other high advertising growth industries predicted by the study include: Aircraft parts at 37%; real estate dealers at 34.4%; outpatient care facilities at 30.5%, residential general building contractors at 28.4% and retail computer stores at 27.3%.

Foreign companies will remain a competitive factor in many markets. Matsushita Electric is predicted to spend $564.6 million on advertising in 1987, considerably more than most U.S. companies. Spending at Honda is expected to be $381.9 billion, an increase of more than 6%, and Hitachi is estimated to hit $306.9 million.

A copy of the 179-page study is available for $325 ($300 prepaid) from Pansophic Systems, 1550 Northwest Hwy., Suite 208, Park Ridge, Ill. 60068.

Women and the Auto Market

Unlocking mystery surrounding consumer category

By Julie Candler

Now that automotive marketers have a picture of the female consumer in mind, they're finding she has an enigmatic smile.

What does she want? Economy or performance cars? Targeted, soft-sell promotions or low-cost financing? Ads addressed directly at her or a nonsegmented approach?

It's easy enough to read research reports that say women influence between 70% and 80% of all car purchases in the U.S. The difficult part is figuring out how to tap into that market.

Difficult, maybe, but critical. Industry researcher J.D. Power predicts that in the next five years, the U.S. auto industry faces the toughest competition in its history as it grapples with a continuing influx of imports and consumer resistance to price increases. Among marketers, he says, the eventual winners might be those who gain women buyers' loyalty.

Detroit-based Julie Candler is a frequent contributor to Special Report.

It's already clear that women can make or break individual car models. According to Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Assn. statistics, women buy 69% of Nissan Pulsars, 62% of Cadillac Cimarrons, 60% of Toyota Corolla SR5s, Plymouth Turismos and Pontiac Fieros and 58% of Ford Escort EXPs. They also buy more than half of Nissan Sentras, Pontiac 1000s, Sunbirds and Grand Ams, Oldsmobile Calais and Toyota Corollas and Celicas.

"It's growing in intensity. As a force it's so powerful that it is time to do something about it," says A.C. "Bud" Liedler, general marketing manager for Detroit-based Chrysler Corp.'s Chrysler-Plymouth division.

In addition to separate ad campaigns, car marketers are targeting women through shifted media buys, dealer training and special promotions. These strategies are part of a pursuit pursuit of women buyers that has been accelerating every year since 1975, when women bought 29% of all vehicles.

In 1985, women spent $46 billion to buy 4.6 million of the 10.8 million cars sold in the U.S., according to Edsel B. Ford II, general marketing manager at Ford Motor Co.'s Lincoln-Mercury division, Detroit.

By 1990, females will account for 44% of all sales, say the automotive market researchers at J.D. Power & Associates, Westlake Village, Cal. Others project females will be half the market by then.

A 249-page Conde Nast Publications' survey published this month concludes that women play a role in 87.5% of all automotive purchases. The survey, by Significance Inc. of Ridgewood, N.J., reports that women buyers typically are employed fulltime, younger and more likely to be single than males who buy.

The Conde Nast report suggests that although women may buy the same cars as men do, their reasons frequently are different. They buy small cars for economy of maintenance and mileage as well as purchase price. Because many women lack repair skills, they are concerned about dependability.

Women buy more imports than males, largely because they perceive them as dependable and worry-free. And because they rely heavily on friends' advice, their influence extends beyond their own purchases.

But one of the main tenets of the Conde Nast study is that female buyers cannot be viewed as a homogeneous group. The study, which divides women buyers into six categories, says auto marketers must employ segmentation in reaching these consumers.

Conde Nast says the largest group, the "value seekers," accounts for one of every five female car buyers. The other five groupings, in order of size, are the driving enthusiasts, domestic budget-minded, comfort seekers, affluent luxury seekers and the voluntary minimalists.

An example of the accelerated pursuit of women customers is supplied by Robert B. Jarboe, director-marketing at Detroit-based General Motors' Oldsmobile division. Preliminary plans call for 63% of Oldsmobile 1987 model year ad budget to go to prime-time tv. Shows bought will have an audience richer in females (53%) than males.

Another 27% of the budget, spent in magazines, this year will be split evenly between traditional men's books such as Sports Illustrated and magazines, including People, with larger female readerships. Pages in women's books such as Cosmopolitan and Redbook will total 32, up about 25% from last year.

Another 4% of the budget is expected to go to the nation's top newspapers, including USA Today.

Women buy 37% of all Oldsmobiles. But because so many of the division's models are appealing to buyers 50 and older, the company is targeting professional and managerial working women 25 to 54 years old and putting a bit more emphasis on dependability in over-all ad themes.

Many auto marketers and industry observers say the best approach is to include women in ads without creating a separate marketing campaign. That philosophy has been a cornerstone of marketing policy for Toyota, Nissan, Mazda and Honda, importers whose success with women buyers has kept thousands of small Japanese cars steaming toward U.S. shores (see accompanying chart).

It's worked for European companies, too. In 1987, for the first time, ads for Volkswagen of America, Troy, Mich., will show people, departing from the product-as-star tradition. "They will be equally divided between males and females, not as an overt attempt to solicit one market segment but to show a different variety of people who buy VWs," says Ron Dusenberry, national advertising manager for Volkswagen. "The ads will be very upscale, not condescending or patronizing." DDB/Detroit, Troy, Mich., handles.

The nonsegmented approach also has worked well for domestic marketers. Women comprise 44% of all buyers for GM's Pontiac Motor division, and the sporty Fiero leads the U.S.-based companies in its ability to attract consumers who previously bought foreign models.

"In demographics, we are moving right in with the buyers of imports," says Bill Heugh, Pontiac manager-marketing. "Now 48% of our buyers are under age 35, while at Toyota it's only 44%. We figure when you go after young, high-spirited people you capture males and females, whoever is out there buying products. The importers were into that idea a lot earlier."

Says Mark Gjovik, management supervisor for Pontiac at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., "We strongly disagree with the strategy where you feminize advertising for the woman buyer. Anytime women sense 'This is an appeal because I'm a woman,' I think they get suspicious and offended. It's condescending."

Pontiac ad manager Charlene Curry says, for example, both males and females responded positively to the 1986 tv commercial featuring a mother whose teenage son encourages her to buy a sporty red Sunbird.

But while the nonsegmented approach has been successful for Pontiac, some experts disapprove. Jayne Hamilton, consultant on the women's market and president of Market Development Associates, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., says she doesn't understand why cars should be treated differently from other products—tobacco and clothing, for instance—featured in ads prepared specifically for the women's magazines. "Products advertised in Vogue and Cosmopolitan are never generically discussed," she says. "You need to talk to women."

J.D. Power & Associates research director Charles Shillingburg agrees. "Women want more information on cars and they don't feel they are getting it," Mr. Shillingburg says. "According to our research, a sizable proportion of women would like to see women's magazines provide more informative articles or advertising. We intend to investigate the types of information they would want. Our guess is that it would be different from what men want."

Mr. Shillingburg's theory is that, as often is said of package goods, "Men buy and women shop," and therefore women ask for more information before making a decision.

"Some car makers have very high proportions of women buyers and they shouldn't be ignoring it," he says. "They should be pointing out the benefits to women. I think they need a separate campaign and a separate media plan." He recommends buys in women's books because "that's what they read."

Media buys for 1987 models show that many car marketers agree with his assessment. "We are looking at some specific women's magazines," says Ms. Curry at Pontiac. "We know most of our competition is out there making a concerted effort [to attract women buyers] and we want women to know that we care, too."

Conde Nast puts the pieces together

Value seekers—These women want it all. They are aggressive drivers and like cars with great pickup, yet they will watch the price. Japanese name plates score well with them, although they do like Dodges. Most are single, average age 29, working fulltime and have attended college.
Comfort seekers—The oldest purchasing group, these women are very conservative when purchasing an automobile. Most are retired, and few attended college. They try to save money and look for rebates. They prefer larger domestic cars, including Oldsmobiles and Buicks
Driving enthusiasts—Life in the fast lane: These women like sports and gambling, and are keenly interested in their cars. They are single, 30-35 and prefer American performance cars such as Pontiacs, Chevys and Dodges.
Affluent luxury seekers—With household incomes $20,000 higher than the average, these women are the big spenders. They will not hesitate to spend money on an expensive European import. Most are married and work fulltime in a professional position. Average age is 41. They don't buy as many American cars as Detroit could wish.
Voluntary minimalists—These women choose to spend as little time as possible thinking about cars. Most are married, well-educated, white-collar workers with an average age of 40. They prefer Chevys, Fords, Plymouths and AMCs.
Budget-minded—These consumers are family-minded homemakers. Their average age is 43 and very few have attended college. If they work, they hold clerical or factory positions. They love American cars—Fords, Chevys and Oldsmobiles—and stay away from foreign models.

Cadillac and Vogue engineer stylish promotion

By Raymond Serafin

Where marketing to women is concerned, Cadillac is in Vogue —to advertise a mall promotion it is conducting with the help of Conde Nast Publications' fashion monthly.

In a pilot program that began March 25, General Motors Corp.'s luxury division has teamed up with New York-based Vogue to present a multimedia fashion and car display in upscale shopping malls. High-fashion murals attract women shoppers to kiosks, where the ultra-soft sell includes a computerized light and sound show about the $26,000 Seville Elegante and an offer to test drive the car.

> "Seville lends itself to an association with high fashion."
> John Grettenberger Cadillac

"The women we're trying to attract are interested in high fashion and have the wherewithal to attain it," says John O. Grettenberger, GM vp and general manager for Detroit-based Cadillac. "Vogue is extremely well-respected by them.

"And Seville lends itself to an association with high fashion."

Norman Waterman, Vogue associate ad director, calls the matchup "an ideal demographic situation. Women come to Vogue for ideas on how to live their lives with style."

Dubbed "Cadillac expressions with viewpoints from Vogue," the program is designed to entertain as well as to inform. A continuous three-screen audio-visual presentation presents a Vogue program on contemporary women's life styles, while interactive video booths offer consumer tips on health, beauty, fashion and automobiles.

While Cadillac developed and funds the promotion, the magazine maintains control over the photos and editorial matter.

A sweepstakes offers prizes, including a $500 shopping spree at the mall and a "fashion week" in Paris valued at $5,000. All who test drive a Cadillac receive a complimentary tote bag.

"The sweepstakes gives us a contact point to assess further interest," says Peter Levin, Cadillac director-merchandising. The names of those women who do show interest are forwarded to a telemarketing company that sets up appointments for test drives at dealerships.

The Seville is one style Cadillac would like Vogue readers to use to express themselves.

"This is a recognition that going to an automotive showroom is not always the most pleasant thing in a woman's life," Mr. Levin says. "We're trying to reach out to women in a relaxed, positive environment."

Mr. Grettenberger says the program represents Cadillac's first effort aimed exclusively at women.

Company statistics show that about one-third of the principal drivers of the Seville, redesigned as a front-wheel-drive car for 1986, are women. Cadillac officials believe higher visibility in women's circles could boost that figure to 50%.

The display, which debuted at Phoenix's Biltmore Fashion Park, stays in a mall four to five days. According to Mr. Levin, 70% of the women surveyed thus far have said the program improved their image of Cadillac.

In addition to national and regional ads in Vogue, Cadillac gives dealers ad slicks and radio scripts to promote the mall displays. Cadillac agency D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., handles.

Mr. Grettenberger says Cadillac likely will continue the show in some form after its 23-week pilot run in western states. The division is considering expanding the program. Variations under consideration include: Adding the Allante, a $50,000 two-seat convertible designed by Italian stylist Sergio Pininfarina, to displays; developing a separate program for medium-size markets, and preparing a program for use exclusively in dealerships.

Cadillac and Vogue drove right into the mall for a promotion designed to entertain and inform.

Unlocking category mystery

model year ran an eight-page "Women in Motion" advertorial insert in eight issues of Cosmopolitan. Editorial pages featured a fitness topic; only the ads addressed automotive subjects. Four sections contained a preapproved credit application.

"We probably won't do as large a campaign in any one magazine for '87," says Jane Hammond, chairwoman of Chevrolet's Women's Marketing Committee, which, like a group at Chrysler, helps develop strategies for reaching women.

Unlike Pontiac, however, since 1981 Chevrolet has been addressing ads directly to women in magazines such as Working Woman. In tv spots, Chevy replaced some sports buys with more female-audience prime-time programing.

Mr. Ford emphasizes that Lincoln-Mercury, too, recognizes the importance of the women's market. While he once doubted the value of women's books, the division this spring announced a schedule of ads in books such as Ms., Savvy and Working Woman.

And although their success with female buyers has been credited to nonsegmented advertising, many importers also are targeting media buys to women.

Now that women account for more than 40% of American Honda Motor Co. sales, advertising to them will be "a little more aggressive," says Gerry Rubin, president of Rubin, Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, agency for the Gardena, Cal.-based company.

This month, when Honda dealers gather in Reno, Nev., to see new model cars, they will view a videotape featuring Gloria Steinem, USA Today publisher Cathleen Black and four leading Honda dealers discussing marketing to women.

Nissan Motor Corp. U.S.A., Torrance, Cal., will decrease its tv sports buys to make room for programs that attract more female viewers, says Terry Foutz, national car ad manager.

But he cites focus-group research showing that women don't want to be singled out. "They want to be treated as intelligent consumers who have the money to make their own choices."

Women are the subject of promotions

Although advertising seems to attract the most attention, U.S. auto marketers are using a variety of promotions designed with women buyers in mind.

- Chevrolet's first extensive campaign targeting women, launched in the 1986 model year, included a series of two-day "Strategies" career conferences in major markets. Featuring celebrities like Barbara Walters in addition to Chevrolet product displays, the first six meetings drew 15,000 visitors. The company predicts 100,000 will have attended by the summer of 1987.
- Women buy 43% of the cars sold by Chrysler Corp., where corporate vps appoint 20 men and women to the company's Advisory Committee on the Women's Automotive Market.

Chrysler chairman Gerald Greenwald outlined specific programs targeting women in a May speech to women's magazine editors and writers. "AutoInfo," in-depth discussions by sales, service and product experts, will be held in major markets, with three scheduled for this year. In addition, "Right from the Start" evening workshops are designed to introduce recent buyers to dealer service personnel, who outline maintenance basics.

Plymouth also is spending $1 million this fall in a joint promotion with New York-based Cosmair's L'Oreal cosmetics. Chrysler-Plymouth's general marketing manager, A.C. Liebler, says 18,000 retail outlets will have promotional materials. The campaign features the company's new Sundance model and L'Oreal's new Sundance lipstick and nail enamel.

Ads in the September issues of Cosmopolitan, Glamour and Working Woman kick off a giveaway of 10 cars and trips to New York for L'Oreal makeovers. Sundance ads will run next month.

Mr. Liebler adds that Chrysler-Plymouth will test "American Women's Life" conferences in Atlanta and Philadelphia, featuring local authorities, psychologist Sonya Friedman as moderator and celebrity keynoters.

- Instead of conferences, both Lincoln-Mercury and Ford divisions set up product displays and offer free test drives at national conventions that draw young career women.

Other Ford Motor Co. appeals to women include a free car-buying reference guide, "Car Buying Made Easier." L-M also is developing shop-at-home video-cassettes. Available free, they contain nine-minute clips about the company's nine car lines.

At its recent new model introduction for dealers in Century City, Cal., the division presented optional seminars on attracting women customers.

- American Motors Corp. formed a Women's Task Force in 1985. The nine members offer new-product evaluations and travel to major cities for radio, tv and newspaper interviews. They discuss Renault passenger cars and the advantages for women of four-wheel-drive vehicles such as AMC's Jeep Cherokee and Wagoneer sport utility models, 19.5% of which were purchased by women in 1985.

Sponsors who think big can turn special events into banner events

When Paul Britten thinks outdoor advertising, he thinks big outdoor advertising. Not just little dinky billboards, but 1,000-ton banners that cover the side of an office building or a football field.

Britten, president of Britten Banners, Washington, D.C., formed the company in January to design and sell outdoor advertising ideas to corporate sponsors of special events. He became interested in outdoor advertising as an architecture student at the University of Detroit. By the time he graduated in 1985, he'd designed two banners for General Motors Corp.

Using a special process of nylon-reinforced paper that makes the banner lightweight and durable, Britten first designed a football field-size Christmas card. "Santa's sleigh is a Chevrolet" was emblazoned on the banner positioned across a GM building. Another GM sign showed the Detroit Tigers and GM logos, with the theme, "Two No. 1 Teams."

Britten's main project in Washington thus far has been a $75,000 "birthday card" for the Statue of Liberty's 100th anniversary measuring 135 ft. by 95 ft. It hung for four days on the downtown building of its corporate sponsor, Perpetual American Bank.

"It's a pr stunt, but stunts like this work," Britten says. "It's an interesting outlet for corporations. Even though the banners are only up for a week, everyone remembers them—unlike the common billboard, which may be up for two years and no one notices it."

Britten likes to tie banners to special events such as the Constitution's upcoming bicentennial, the 1988 Olympics or the International Congress of Large Dams. He then finds corporate sponsors—not always the easiest sale in the world. He had wanted to hang the Liberty card near New York's Battery Park but couldn't obtain a New York backer.

But Britten knows he has something special to offer. "Our motto," he says, "is if you have something big to say, say it big."

Fashion's brought to its knees with a new fanciful accessory

Designer knee pads seem an unlikely idea. But Stewart Seidman, president of J.J. Gams, New York, has already sold 1 million pairs of Kid Knees and Trend Knees, fanciful fashion knee pads with an average price of $5 a pair.

Now available in such diverse emporiums as Bloomingdale's, Macy's, K mart, Venture Stores and Kids 'R' Us, the hand-washable knee pads can double as elbow pads too. Although they're stitched together with a Velcro-fastened back pocket for storing keys or money, Kid Knees are hardly utilitarian. In fact, a disclaimer on the package states the pads should not be used "for protective purposes or as a medical device."

The knee pads are attention-getting accessories that J.J. Gams hopes will become as much a part of a child's wardrobe as socks and as valued as trading cards. Embellished with glitter or characters like Ghostbusters, Slime Ghost and Mad Balls, the pairs of pads can be split up and traded off with friends for other designs.

Kid Knees even have a bit of Hollywood behind them and will be worn by junior players on fall episodes of "Who's the Boss," "Different Strokes" and "Mr. Belvedere."

Also in the works are promotional tie-ins with Ralston-Purina and McDonald's.

Think of it as "a mini t-shirt with a message," Seidman says.

Ralph Snart currently is tied up, but his wacky mind is unbound

Have you ever had one of those days? You know the kind. Those days when if just one more thing goes wrong, if the boss says just one more stupid thing, you're going to go over the edge for real. They'll have to take you away to the funny farm.

Take a deep breath and pick up a copy of "Ralph Snart Adventures," a new comic devoted to the delusions of an accountant who went over the edge ahead of you.

A combination of art styles influenced by "Mad" magazine of the 1950s and 1960s (particularly "Mad" artist Don Martin) and the underground "comix" of the late 1960s and 1970s (particularly the infamous R. Crumb), "Snart" is pure satire, aimed at sophisticated adult audiences. The comic pokes fun at media images, office politics, feminism and just about everything else as crazy Ralph dreams up wild adventures from the comfort of his straightjacket in the Montgomery Home for the Really Insane.

The product of comic artist Marc Hansen, a former designer for advertising graphics house Grazziano, Kraft & Zale, "Snart" was originally published as a three-issue black and white miniseries by Chicago-based NOW Comics with a limited press run of about 15,000 copies distributed through direct sale comic shops around the country.

Fans took to the book immediately, and even though the creator had planned to end with the miniseries (and the eventual cure of poor Ralph), it looks like a long stay in the looney bin for the hero.

"Ralph has a lot of appeal," explains NOW publisher Tony Caputo. "He's just like you and me. He had one bad day too many at the office and just snapped. Everyone identifies."

"Ralph Snart Adventures" begins monthly publication in October with 28 pages of story and art for $1 with immediate distribution in comic specialty shops and eventual distribution through chain bookstores including Waldenbooks and B. Dalton, Caputo says.

" 'Snart' is not the usual kid's comic book," he adds. "Although it can be read by a younger audience, it is really for and about adults, and it should be distributed where adults can find it."

Also coming for Christmas is the "Ralph Snart Adventures" graphic novel in full color, and after the success of a one-of-a kind Ralph Snart soft sculpture at a recent Chicago comic convention, possibly a Snart doll that you can straightjacket in the privacy of your own home.

Hair-restorer drugs brush with the FDA

By PAT SLOAN

New York—At least three marketers are expected to bring out new products next year that claim to replace thinning hair.

Upjohn Co., Kalamazoo, Mich., is expected to introduce Regaine, a hair-restorer drug that still has not received Food & Drug Administration approval.

Wayne, N.J.-based American Cyanamid's Lederle Laboratories has an experimental compound called viprostol in preliminary clinical tests and reportedly is working on a second nonprescription hair-regrowth product. Viprostol also has not been approved by the FDA.

Crinos International SpA, a drug and cosmetic company based in Como, Italy, expects by early 1987 to import Foltene, a hair-regrowth product it already markets in Europe and Canada.

Foltene, however, will be positioned as a hair preparation "to keep your hair stimulated and healthy looking," according to Alan Klein, president of International Partnerships, a New York and Paris-based consultancy specializing in multinational acquisitions and licensing agreements, which is handling Foltene's search for a U.S. distributor. IP was a division of Foote, Cone & Belding until Mr. Klein spun it off in 1984.

The hair-preparation designation would make Foltene a cosmetic, and would not need FDA approval as a prescription drug. Product packaging and advertising will make no reference to actual hair regrowth. However, the company plans a publicity effort to encourage discussion in consumer articles of Foltene's properties of hair regrowth and prevention of further hair loss—claims the product does make in its European advertising.

Introduced in Europe five years ago, Foltene became the "third-largest-selling product in all categories of goods sold in French pharmacies" within the first three years, according to Mr. Klein. Toothpaste was first and Biotherm, L'Oreal's skincare line, was second.

"In every country where it's sold, it has consistently ranked within the top 10 products according to IMS audits," he said.

No agency has been named for Foltene which at $32 per box of 10 vials—a typical recommended treatment would call for two boxes initially and then one every six months—is priced much less than Regaine, the cost of which is expected to exceed $85 a month.

Though Upjohn Co. has to receive FDA approval for its long-awaited hair restorer lotion, financial analysts still expect the drug marketer to introduce Regaine sometime next year. Analysts are projecting $200 million in sales during the first year against an initial target market of 2 million men. Klemtner Advertising, New York, handles Regaine, the brand name for Upjohn's minoxidil compound, which will be available only by prescription. Minoxidil has been approved for prescription sale in Canada.

Though its competitors are saying Lederle will have its product out by 1987, a Lederle spokesman countered, "That's impossible. There's no way. We still have to get Food & Drug Administration approval."

One analyst, who wished not to be identified, said no approval is likely for viprostol before the end of the decade. However, he said Cyanamid might take a version of the active drug in combination with a placebo and position it as a hair-regrowth cosmetic, instead of a drug, so that it could be sold without prescription.#

Changing tastes grinding away at coffee sales

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

For over 20 years, the coffee industry has had a long-term decline, though the last few years have shown a flattening trend. However, we continue to believe the trend toward cold and sweet drinks and away from hot and acrid drinks will continue to have adverse ramifications on the coffee industry for the foreseeable future.

There are those who believe the industry can do three things to possibly overcome some of these trends. The first is to raise the quality of the product, particularly in the ground area. The second is to offer more products and further segments in the industry, such as the soft-drink industry has done, so there is something for everyone's taste. Last, but not least, an advertising program to further elevate the image of coffee might be put into place. A recent study shows that 80% of the people in their 20s in 1963 drank coffee. This percentage is now down to 40%.

As was the case in the past, decaffeinated coffee appears to be the growth area in 1985. This ties in with the health syndrome of the 1980s, helped by the aggressive advertising of caffeine-free products in the soft-drink industry. In the last few years there seemed to be a trend toward soluble coffee, but this appears to have flattened out, probably because of the big jump in price. In the market-share game, General Foods continues to move ahead in the regular-coffee area, but lost slightly in the instant area (see above).#

Saatchi ousts Jacoby; Zuckert taking over

By STEWART ALTER and STEVEN W. COLFORD

Considering the web of power plays, intrigue and back-stabbing that led to Robert Jacoby being succeeded Sept. 19 as chairman-ceo of Ted Bates Worldwide by Donald Zuckert, last week's drama involving Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s largest agency might be dubbed "Macbates."

And in the final scene, Mr. Jacoby, in an exclusive interview Sept. 19 with ADVERTISING AGE, told a different version of events from that given officially or reported widely by sources.

Mr. Jacoby who said he was hearing about the announcement officially for the first time from a reporter, acknowledged that he had been "forced out," and felt it might have been the Saatchis "taking revenge" because "they paid us so much money."

The changes were a stunning rejection of Mr. Jacoby's recent management realignment

Gillette world buy aids Murdoch net

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—Gillette Co., working through Omnicom Group's BBDO agency, opens a new chapter in global marketing next month with the first transcontinental media buy.

Using Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. Ltd. tv systems, Gillette last week concluded a three-year, $4 million buy on Mr. Murdoch's proposed fourth U.S. tv network, the European direct-broadcast satellite Sky Channel, and Network Ten in Australia.

The single buy will reach 17 countries and, if successful, could expand to include Mr. Murdoch's international newspaper holdings in the U.K., U.S. and Australia.

The deal represents a major coup for BBDO and its holding company parent, Omnicom. Officially in business as of last month, this $5 billion agency group in large measure was designed so that Omnicom and its agencies would appeal to advertisers who are involved with global marketing.

Besides lending credibility to the Omnicom concept, the deal also lends considerable credibility to Mr. Murdoch's plan to use his worldwide broadcast and print media properties to facilitate U.S. advertiser expansion into global marketing. If the strategy works, it would give his News Corp. a considerable sales advantage over any of the Big 3 U.S. tv networks.

With FOX, Gillette becomes one of the new network's charter advertisers on "The Late Show with Joan Rivers" and at least two other programs scheduled to premier this fall. With Network Ten, Gillette becomes a primary sponsor of the network's coverage of the America's Cup yacht races in Perth next year.

Tv prices tied to inflation, Tisch predicts

By CRAIG REISS

New York—Laurence Tisch, acting ceo of CBS Inc., last week declared that tv is no longer a commodities business.

At a press briefing at CBS headquarters Sept. 15, Mr. Tisch said advertiser spending on media now will reflect the consumer price index and the rate of inflation, a radical departure from traditional network tv thinking that tv is a commodity and that prices reflect supply and demand.

"I think we've come through a decade of above-average growth in advertising expenditures, and that decade is over," said Mr. Tisch, who also is chairman of Loews Corp. Loews owns 24.91% of CBS, and Mr. Tisch Sept. 10 spearheaded the ouster of former CBS chairman Thomas Wyman.

"We are in a new decade, where growth in advertising expenditures will be more in line with growth in the economy," he said. "Add to that total framework the competition we have for growth in media, and I think that total media expenditures will track the consumer price index."

Network sales executives long have argued that tv prices had nothing to do with the rate of inflation. This argument was especially voiced in recent years as the national inflation rate began to subside and advertisers increased their demands that annual network tv price increases no longer could reach double-digit levels.

Network and advertiser sources described Mr. Tisch's comments as realistic, but cautioned against presuming that network prices would see little or no increase in the next few years.

"The history of advertising spending [on tv] is that it has

GM shakeup cuts shop fees

By RAYMOND SERAFIN

Detroit—General Motors is restructuring its relationships with its car agencies, cutting commission rates but at least partly making up for that by paying fees for collateral work the shops formerly performed for free.

One source indicated GM's eventual goal, through annual reviews of its agency arrangements, is to get the commission on media buying as low as 3%.

Neither the auto maker nor its agencies would comment officially on the changes. Philip Guarascio, executive director-advertising services, said only that GM is working with its agencies "to achieve superior advertising at a competitive cost with a fair return to them."

Sources indicated that each division is negotiating the specifics with its agency. In general, compensation for core work on each account is being set up on a sliding scale. Work on projects such as showroom catalogs will be done on a fee basis. Agencies conceivably could recoup their commission losses with those fees, depending on workload.

Shops affected are Campbell-Ewald, Warren, which han-

Plapler hit by People Express sale

Is there a future under Texas Air?

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

NEW YORK—Texas Air chairman Frank Lorenzo's bid to create the largest airline in the free world by adding People Express and Frontier Airlines to his holdings means bumpy weather ahead for People Express agency Plapler Russo & Associates here.

Readying a challenge to industry leaders United Airlines and American Airlines, Texas Air has indicated the People Express and Frontier names will disappear: Frontier will be combined with Texas Air's Continental Airlines unit and People Express with Continental or some other Texas Air unit.

A key step for Mr. Lorenzo, the acquisition of Eastern Air Lines, was approved by the Transportation Department last week. Texas Air also controls New York Air.

People Express is a crucial account at Plapler, representing about $37 million of Plapler's $50 million in annualized billings.

"There is a threat here, logically," agency chairman Larry Plapler acknowledged last week. "But no one knows exactly what's going to happen yet." People Express' decision to ground Frontier Airlines and place it in bankruptcy already had ended Frontier's ties to Bloom Agency, Dallas.

Mr. Plapler said James O'Donnell, vp-marketing at Texas Air's Continental unit, has called to "say hello, just to tell me that they were aware of us and that he was sensitive to our position."

But Mr. Plapler said he had received no indications of how the proposed merger may affect his agency.

Mr. Plapler said his shop will continue operating even if People Express disappears, but "it would be three-quarters smaller."

The agency employs 40 people to serve four major accounts, including People Express.

Mr. O'Donnell said last week no changes would be made immediately if the sale is final. Analysts have speculated that the federal goverment may object to the proposed takeover because several People routes overlap those of New York Air.

"People Express has an agency, and I'm not aware that they have any plans to make a change," Mr. O'Donnell said.

"As long as People Express is People Express, they'll have their own ad agency."

He observed, however, that People will go out of existence "at some undefined point in time."

Mr. Plapler said his agency may pursue business from the much enlarged Texas Air once the various deals are closed.

He believes it will be "business as usual until People Express is folded into one of the Texas companies. And at that point, I see it as a tremendous opportunity. You can bet your teeth that we're going to be fighting to be a part of that deal."

But Texas Air's increasing size is attracting the attention of giant national agencies that also want to climb aboard the new airline colossus. The $25 million account at Houston-based Continental is in review and the race is between N W Ayer and J. Walter Thompson USA, both New York.

Miami-based Eastern is handled by Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich.; New York Air's agency is Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver.

If all the acquisitions are consummated, Texas Air would be flying about 590 jets. United, currently the biggest U.S. carrier, has 361 jets. The combined Texas Air empire also will have hubs in Denver and Newark, strong enough to be an issue when the Transportation Department reviews Mr. Lorenzo's takeover strategy.

In the New York area, People Express and Eastern rank first and second in flight departures. In Denver, Continental and Frontier both had strong operations.

Among Plapler Russo's other major accounts are Berkey Marketing Cos., the video and photographic equipment unit of Berkey Inc., Woodside, N.Y.; Media News Group, a newspaper group based in Texas whose owners recently purchased the Dallas Times Herald under a different corporate flag, and Hammond Maps and Atlases.#

Wine coolers double sales in '85

By JOHN C. MAXWELL JR.

Once again, wine coolers put in a spectacular performance, more than doubling in dollar sales from approximately $330 million in 1984 to about $750 million in 1985.

Over-all, we estimate that the cooler market had sales of 38 million cases in 1985 versus 14.8 million in 1984. This enabled the domestic wine industry as a whole to post a 7% increase in total gallons. However, due to a decline in imports for 1985, total industry's gallons were only up 4.4%. Without coolers, the over-all U.S. wine industry would have been down close to 6%.

However, the inevitable shakeout in the cooler industry began in 1985, and we expect it will continue this year. For the first year or so, entry into the cooler market was relatively easy, resulting in a peak of about 150 brands on the market in 1985. Then, as the "big boys" came into the picture with hefty ad budgets and savvy marketing skills, lesser brands began to drop out. As a result, in 1985 we estimate that the "Big Four" dominated about 75% of the market. These would include Brown-Forman's California Cooler with an estimated 30% share in 1985, E. & J. Gallo's Bartles & Jaymes with approximately 20%, Canandaigua's Sun Country with 15% and Seagram & Sons' Seagram Cooler with about 10%.

Gallo and Brown-Forman are vying for first place, and both have claimed to hold that position at different times. in 1985, we believe that the top 10 coolers held about 90% of the market. This supports our conclusion that further thinning of the ranks will occur within the 100 brands out there. In addition to the traditional categories that have been established, more of the majors now are trying to establish niches in what they call the wine "refresher" market. An example of this would be Anheuser-Busch with Bayberry's champagne cooler entry this year.

Although a slowdown in the 175% growth rate seen this year is expected, coolers will continue to grow at a good clip and could reach 70 million cases this year. This type of product fits perfectly with today's consumer preference for cool, sweet, portable beverages as well as a trend toward a more moderate and healthier life style. As wine coolers have an alcoholic content of 4% to 6%, they are generally lower in proof than either table wines or liquor.

Although coolers provided the leverage that the wine industry needed to move ahead, they have also affected table wine growth as well as beer. For example, in 1984 the table wine industry was off about 2%, but in 1985 fell about 5%. We estimate that approximately one-third of coolers sales have come from beer, with one-third coming from ordinary wine and the rest split between soft drinks and new users.

U.S. wine market: Sales and shares

Gallo continues to dominate the wine market, holding more than a quarter of the total share. Paul Masson and Wi Spectrum now owned by Seagram. (Combined 1983 volume would rank second). Figures are in millions of gallons ar share of market. Source: John C. Maxwell Jr.

The import market fell to lowest point in three years wi 7.4% decline in 1985 and the decline since 1979. Four of the major importing countries, It Germany, Spain and Portu posted declines in 1985. The ex tion was France, which showe 2.3% increase. The largest dec was seen in Germany, which down 10.1%.

After losing a slight amoun market share in 1984, E. & J. G rebounded in 1985, widening No. 1 position in the domestic w market. Over-all sales were e mated to be up 7.4%, with the c pany capturing 26.3% of the t market. A good deal of this per mance was no doubt attributabl the company's entry into the w cooler market, with Bartle Jaymes.

Seagram's wine division showed a hefty increase (up 14. again aided by their cooler en Canandaigua posted the lar year-to-year increase and is ranked No. 3, up 59% in sale 1985 over 1984, again as a resul its Sun Country cooler.

In terms of company perf mances, this was pretty much story across the board; the o with strong brands in the w cooler category had the lar year-to-year growth. Of the to companies, Heublein, Almad Paul Masson and Guild were only ones to post declines. We pect this trend to continue, and companies that will be able to g their market share will be the o with good brand awareness in cooler market.#

Wilkinson may shave tv spending

By LISA E. PHILLIPS

Wilkinson Sword USA may cut television ad spending in favor of more print and sales promotion during the second year of a $23.5 million advertising and promotional program that began last fall.

Rising media costs and flat sales in the $678 million wet-shave category have caused Norcross, Ga.-based Wilkinson to reconsider its marketing strategy.

"We're constantly looking for more cost-effective means of reaching the market," said Wilkinson president Norman Proulx. "Tv still has its place, but now we're looking at radio and even billboards. We're seeing more and more radio and fsis being used by the competition."

Tv accounts for only 25% of this year's ad budget because of "prohibitive costs and underdelivery" of audience, Mr. Proulx said. He earlier hoped to spend more than one-quarter of the total dollars on tv but now is considering a smaller percentage. He said cable tv and the rising use of videocassette recorders have drawn viewers from network tv.

Mr. Proulx believes an approach targeted at specific segments employing sales promotional techniques will enable Wilkinson to compete more effectively than the earlier, broader shotgun approach via network tv.

Wilkinson has 1% of the wet-shave market vs. 60% held by Boston-based Gillette Co. Wilkinson also trails Bic Co. and Schick division of Warner-Lambert, which are battling for the No. 2 slot.

The company joins a growing number of advertisers (AA, July 28) in increasing sales-promotional activity at the expense of media. Its stepped-up sales-promotional activity included a product sample giveaway of its Retractor brand razors earlier this year to regional airline passengers, as well as a Fort Lauderdale "Spring Break" giveaway targeted to students vacationing in South Florida.

On Sept. 14, the company kicked off the second phase of its two-year campaign (AA, Sept. 9, '85), using 146 million freestanding inserts in newspapers to announce its Twin II disposable razor tie-in with S.C. Johnson Co.'s Edge shaving gel.

> "I'm dedicated to getting Wilkinson away from its dependency on disposables."
> —Norman Proulx, Wilkinson president

Mail-in coupons offer $5 cash refunds and $2 in coupons with the purchase of both products.

On Nov. 9, another fsi drop offers a 40¢-off coupon with the purchase of either the Profile or the W-II cartridge shaving systems. Technological superiority is stressed with ads headlined "Poly-tetrafluoroethylene XT-3. Only Wilkinson Sword can say it." Also, Wilkinson is sponsoring the "Pennant Chase" show, produced by Major League Baseball, on the Sportschannel cable network.

Wilkinson also will be supporting its higher-profit Profile and W-II cartridge razors with an estimated $3 million tv campaign beginning in January, and heavier sales promotions. Tv spots, via Burton-Campbell, Atlanta, are currently in production.

"I'm dedicated to getting Wilkinson away from its dependency on disposables," Mr. Proulx said. He predicts very slow growth over the next 10 years for disposable razors, currently 48% of total unit sales. Combined cartridges, blades and injector blade refills account for 52% of units sold, but 63% of total retail dollars.#

Fast-food chains' tv spending

Through the first half of 1986, network tv spending by the top fast-food and restaurant chains grew faster (up 15.7%) than did spending on spot tv (up 11.5%), reversing a trend to greater spot tv evident in 1985. Wendy's dropped to the No. 5 ranking from the No. 3 spot it held last year by decreasing network tv spending 5.9% and lowering spot tv spending 2.3%. Domino's Pizza, which increased total tv spending 77%, has moved to the No. 9 spot from No. 11 in 1985. Source: Television Bureau of Advertising, from Broadcast Advertisers Reports data.

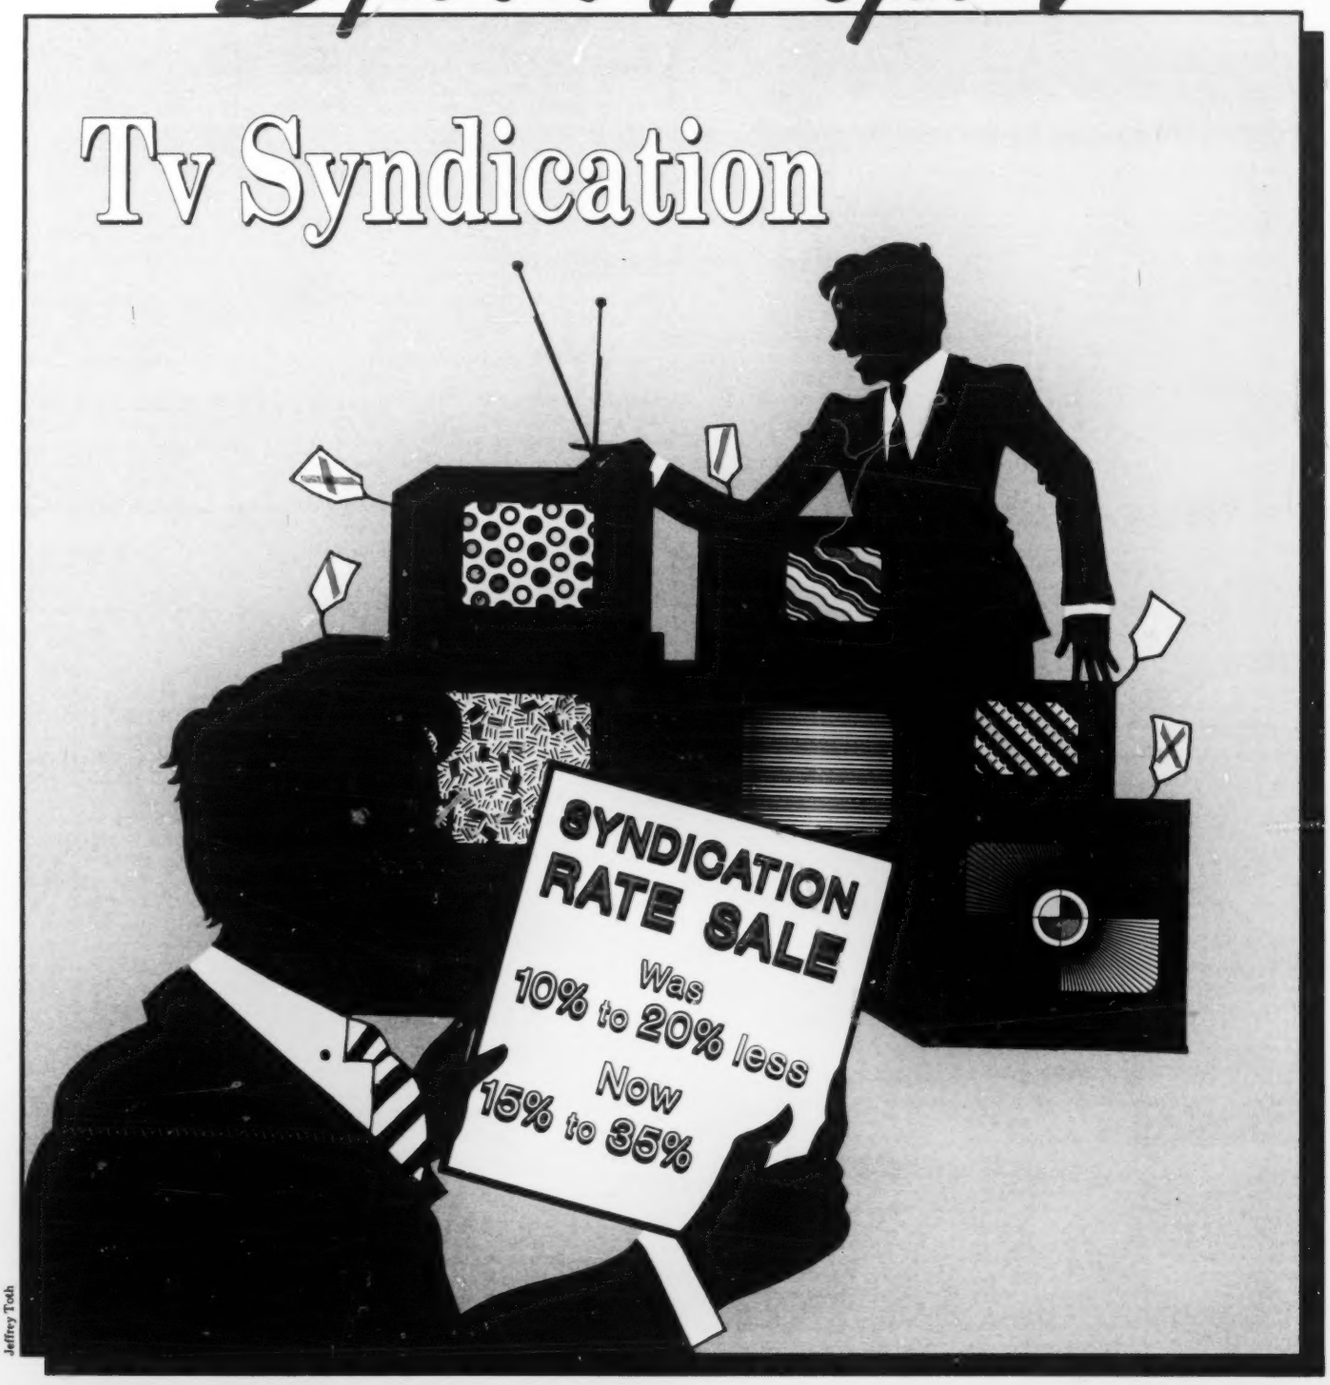
Special Report

Tv Syndication



Jeffrey Toth

Drop in network ad rates cramps barter's style

By Marcy Gray Rubin

It hasn't been as bad as a fire sale, but this year has been a few shades less than rosy for tv barter syndicators. Not only are they being asked to drop their prices or don't bother calling, but, with the rollback in network prime-time rates and all other dayparts as well, advertisers once dependent on syndicated programing as an alternative to costly network spots are no longer beating down the doors for availabilities.

Says one syndication sales executive: "The days of panicked phone calls from agencies claiming to be shut out [because of no network availabilities] are over."

Tv syndication's ad rates long have maintained a close link to networks, but never has this relationship been more vividly apparent. With network rate structures being reduced by 10% to 15% this year, syndication, which traditionally has sold its inventory for 10% to 20% less, is being forced to dip as much as 15% to 35% lower than network fare to attract buyers. To syndicators slugging it out in a soft marketplace, the impact of network rollbacks on barter sales is being felt in a measurable way.

Most syndication executives have no doubt that lower network pricing has directly influenced barter sales. Rich Goldman, vp and general sales manager, Buena Vista Television, a division of Walt Disney Co., Los Angeles, says, "Networks will always be in the driver's seat because of their coverage and national distribution. Because networks and syndicators compete for the same buyers, if networks lower their rates when the market isn't brisk, they take away syndication's pricing advantage."

Another assessment of the situation is that the price slump reflects an over-all cautiousness on the part of advertisers, who are exerting equal pressure on the networks and syndicators.

Network rates cramp barter

Individual dayparts are responding differently to the rollback, according to Dan Cosgrove, New York-based vp-media, Group W Productions, and president of the Advertiser Syndicated Television Assn., the trade organization representing 23 syndication companies. Mr. Cosgrove notes that prime-time activity has been strong, and animated weekday after-school children's strips, led by Tribune Co.'s "GI Joe," Group W's "He-Man and She-Ra" and Lorimar-Telepicture's "Thundercats," are performing exceptionally well.

> "Advertisers are seeking stability in syndication companies. They're looking for clearances in top markets with solid station lineups."
> Rick Levy
> Camelot Entertainment Sales

Daytime remains the weakest link in barter syndication sales. Eroding female audiences have caused advertisers to siphon off daytime dollars and shift them to prime time, where there is greater female viewership.

"We're not able to get near the cpms [cost per thousand] we thought we could in this daypart," says Clark Morehouse, New York-based vp-media sales, Tribune Entertainment.

Mr. Cosgrove suggests that as insufficient ad support forces syndicators to stop producing first-run daytime programing, this time slot will revert to the networks.

Perhaps syndication's biggest battle is not being waged against the networks but against itself. Once considered broadcasting's black sheep, the industry's recent success and increased respectability has attracted scores of new players. But there remains a vast difference between the Goliaths, such as Lexington Broadcast System Communications and King World, with their substantial inventory of sure-fire hits, and the Davids, the newcomers with a few borderline shows.

"Because of the inherent risks in syndication not generally found in network," says Rick Levy, president of Camelot Entertainment Sales, a division of King World, New York, "advertisers are seeking stability in syndication companies. They're looking for clearances in top markets with solid station lineups."

Adds Larry Feinstein, vp-national advertiser sales, All American Television, New York, "Only a handful of shows are secure. There is a real disparity between the top-rated shows and everyone else."

The hotly demanded shows may not be quite as vulnerable to soft network pricing. Steve Goldman, vp-sales marketing, Paramount Pictures, New York, whose "Entertainment Tonight" covers 92% of U.S. tv households, says, "Buyers look on any barter show that provides 90% coverage as equal to any network show. Audience demographics and coverage is the key. It doesn't matter if they're syndication or network, advertisers want properties that perform."

Joseph F. Cifarelli, New York-based vp-media sales, Multimedia Entertainment, agrees. "Strong syndicated programs will always sell out," he says. Multimedia hopes the same success that its "Donahue" has enjoyed will rub off on "Sally Jessy Raphael," which has sold 80% of its inventory upfront.

No two shows are more indicative of syndication's success in a soft market than top-ranked "Wheel of Fortune" and "Jeopardy." Dubbed the "phenomena of the industry," these King World productions have achieved the near impossible —a rate increase.

With advertising sales of 87% at press time and a 10% yearly increase in ratings and audience over the past two years, "Wheel," with a 16.1 rating in Nielsen's July, 1986, Cassandra report, holds a record asking price of $95,000 per 30-second spot, based on a projected Nielsen National Television Index yearly rating of 19.0 for the upcoming season. "Jeopardy," called the "Cosby of syndication" by Camelot's Mr. Levy, has a Cassandra rating of 9.9 and, with a projected yearly NTI rating of 13, is asking $53,000 per 30-second spot (AA, Aug. 18).

Despite their dazzling track records, even these blockbusters remain victims of the marketplace to some degree. "If networks were able to raise their cpms by 10%, we would have done the same," Mr. Levy says.

King World is counting on repeating its success with newcomers "The Oprah Winfrey Show" and "Nightlife" with David Brenner. Already, "Winfrey" covers 90% of the country on 100 network affiliates, and "Nightlife" is seen in more than 100 markets. In Mr. Levy's opinion, late-night rates are equal to or slightly higher than last year's because of the eroding daytime female audience and advertisers' subsequent decisions to place more dollars in night-time programing.

In any season the chance of survival for many new shows seems slim. More than one syndicator confesses to having trouble getting new syndicated programs, even proven offnetwork hits, off the ground. Lacking the clout of ratings or recognition, new shows often fail to attract advertisers. "Buyers will always use leverage when dealing with these shows whether they are syndicated or network," Paramount's Mr. Goldman says.

However, not all newcomers are feeling the pinch. Although this marks Disney's first year in barter sales, the company is successfully moving its limited inventory. In addition to returning its "World of Disney" and feature film package "Disney Magic I," Disney unveils three new entries this season: "Siskel & Ebert & the Movies," "Business Day" (working title) and the animated "Duck Tails."

"Despite the knowledge that cpms are a driving factor, I'm not reacting to network pricing when I'm selling," says New York-based Rick North, vp-advertiser sales, Buena Vista Television. "It's the buyers who bring it up. My response is to make a deal that is comfortable for everyone."

The fallout from cheaper network rates also has forced syndicators to push for upfront sales, rather than gamble on the scatter market. This strategy has been adopted especially by bigger syndicators that have the most inventory to sell. According to Mike Wieden, New York-based exec vp-advertising sales, LBS Communications, returning shows such as "Fame," "What's Happening Now" and "MGM/UA Premiere Network," are virtually 90% sold at press time, while new entries such as "Hollywood Squares" and "The New Gidget" are 80% sold. "We don't leave anything significant for scatter if we can get fair prices upfront," Mr. Weiden says.

Tribune Entertainment's Mr. Morehouse cites similar figures, stating that 85% to 98% of his company's inventory has been purchased. This includes offnetwork property "Charles in Charge" and first-runs "At the Movies" and "What a Country." He says the difference between scatter and upfront rates isn't lucrative enough to warrant holding off sales.

At the other end of the spectrum, smaller barter companies such as Buena Vista may choose to allocate larger chunks for scatter budgets in the hope that the market will firm up.

Despite evidence that upfront sales are moving smoothly, Mr. Feinstein accuses some syndicators of "psychologically booking orders that haven't been confirmed by the agencies." He sees no concern on the part of advertisers that delaying their decisions will cost them availabilities. Group W's Mr. Cosgrove, however, says, "Sales have recently tightened up as advertisers have decided to come off the fence."

As networks and syndicators vie for the same shrinking dollars, the stage may be set for a classic shakeout. According to Mr. North and others, those companies most financially vulnerable are what he terms "the one or two-note syndicators." Lacking other profit centers, they bank on the ratings of a few shows.

Says Buena Vista's Mr. Goldman, "Most new products have a tendency to fail. Those who will withstand the shakeout will need deep pockets to survive." To guarantee their solvency, Mr. Goldman predicts an increase in mergers among smaller syndicators, while larger companies will broaden their distribution channels through station ownership.

All American Television, in an effort to diversify, is involved in a joint distribution venture with Group W, Mr. Feinstein says. These programs are "Newsfeed," a Group W production, and "Entertainment Report," a 15-minute satellite feed produced by All American that can be inserted in local, early evening news. He says All American, which currently syndicates "America's Top 10," intends to enter cash sales, although barter still will comprise 70% of its business.

A brighter scenario offered by Camelot's Mr. Levy calls for narrowing the gap between network and syndication rate structures. "Today a 15 rating in network and a 15 in syndication won't command the same advertising dollar, but as syndicated shows continue earning ratings equal to the networks, these differences will shrink and pricing will level out."

The most immediate concern among syndicators, however, is how long the current price dip will last. Paramount's Mr. Goldman and LBS' Mr. Weiden say pricing slumps evolve naturally and can just as easily bounce back with the arrival of the election year and the Olympics in 1988. Mr. Goldman also is confident that the absorption of commercial availabilities resulting from 15-second spots will tighten up the market.

Both Tribune's Mr. Morehouse and Multimedia's Mr. Cifarelli predict an upward trend, possibly as soon as next year. According to Mr. Cifarelli, the change will affect prime time before it trickles down to daytime. Not as optimistic as his colleagues, Mr. Feinstein sees no need to panic, but doubts ad budgets are likely to reach their former rates.

No matter how much crystal ball gazing or hair pulling syndicators may engage in, it will take some time before it's clear whether the pricing squeeze will be brief or lingering. Syndicators with the best chances of remaining intact are those making necessary adjustments to ensure their strength when the marketplace favors them again.

Barter syndication's presence grows

- 1986 estimated yearly advertising revenue: $630 million
  1985 yearly advertising revenue: $530 million
  1984 yearly advertising revenue: $430 million
- In 1985, independent stations carried an average of 28.5 hours of barter syndication weekly.
  In 1984, independent stations carried an average of 22.9 hours of barter syndication weekly.
- In 1985, affiliate stations carried an average of 7.7 hours of barter syndication weekly.
  In 1984, affiliate stations carried an average of 6.8 hours of barter syndication weekly.

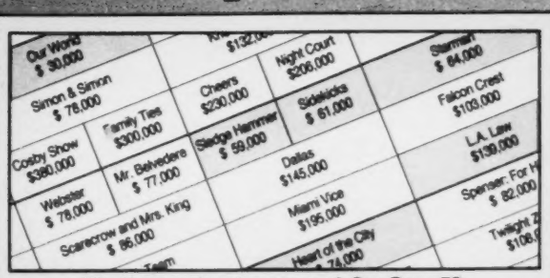
CBS prime time prices slide to third



The three-network scorecard: See Page 70.

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—CBS-TV, the highest-price network last year, has become the cheapest in a fourth-quarter prime time network tv season that saw the average price of a 30-second commercial dip 0.6% to $118,119.

According to ADVERTISING AGE estimates based on interviews with agency buyers and the networks, NBC leads the pricing pack with an average 30-second spot priced at $134,092, up 14% over last year. ABC moves into second place at $112,943, despite a 4% average drop in unit prices. CBS, averaging $120,700 last year, fell 10.9% per unit to $107,491.

The 0.6% over-all reduction in average unit prices compares with a 14% gain last year and is consistent with the fact that a sluggish economy has intensified pressures on media-pricing strategies and advertiser spending plans.

Officials at CBS and NBC confirmed the

News Analysis

If Saatchi & Saatchi Co. had themselves as an account they'd lose it.

This gigantic communications combine seems to be better at articulating strategy than anything else, for its story has not translated well across the Atlantic.

So off-target is its communications that Saatchi's acquisition of Ted Bates Worldwide, with its aftermath of account losses and management turmoil, has polarized the industry perhaps as no other event has done.

With all the money that flowed into the pockets of Bates' ousted ceo Robert Jacoby and other agency executives, the cry has gone out that Saatchi has trampled on the supposedly sacred ground of client-

Maurice's U.S. trip to calm investors

By STEWART ALTER

NEW YORK—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. chairman Maurice Saatchi is said to be planning a U.S. trip to restore confidence on Wall Street after personnel upheavals at Ted Bates Worldwide and continuing client defections.

There was no official confirmation from London-based Saatchi & Saatchi, but the financial community here is expecting a high-power Saatchi delegation to arrive later this fall, most likely in November.

That schedule seems to indicate Mr. Saatchi probably will come armed with the results for the latest fiscal year, which closes Sept. 30, and that his numbers can be expected to be positive and on target, despite the turbulence that has surrounded the company since it announced plans to purchase Bates in May.

It would be an uncharacteristic public relations effort for Mr. Saatchi, who very rarely communicates directly with analysts or the press.

The price of Saatchi stock has dropped from $37 when it acquired Bates to the $25-to-$26 range last week, following the highly publicized sacking of Bates chairman-ceo Robert Jacoby and another client loss, this one involving $25 million in General Foods billings.

GF moved $5 million in Log Cabin syrup billings to Ogilvy & Mather.

The advertiser's second move sent $20 million in combined Louis Rich turkey and luncheon meats and Good Seasons dressings to D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles.

That move was unrelated to the Bates

Westwood looking for radio net

By VERNE GAY

New York—Westwood One, the radio network company, is on an acquisition trail that could soon lead it to ownership of one of the nation's leading radio networks, including those of ABC, CBS or NBC.

Los Angeles-based Westwood One on Sept. 25 filed a proposed offering with the Securities & Exchange Commission to raise $100 million to be "used for acquisitions complementary to the company's existing business."

Norm Pattiz, chairman of Westwood One, said speculation that his company would pursue the NBC Radio division properties was "logical." There have been reports that General Electric, which acquired NBC parent RCA Corp. this summer, wants to sell off the network's radio properties.

But Mr. Pattiz said the $100 million war chest could be used to purchase any of the Big 3 network radio operations.

"It's likely one of the major networks will be sold off," he said, "and [we] want to be in a negotiating position when that happens.

"Our feeling is that there will be additional consolidation in the network radio industry and [with the offering] we're positioning ourselves to take advantage of these," said Mr. Pattiz. "Are we close to making a deal? No. Do we think things are going to happen in the marketplace? Sure we do. We feel in a

Burgerville spots add a dimension

By BRIAN LOWRY

A small Vancouver, Wash.-based hamburger chain is about to bring a new dimension to the world of tv advertising.

The Holland Inc., which operates 29 Burgerville USA restaurants in Oregon, will air what it claims is the first 3-D tv commercial in late October.

The 3-D spots cap a yearlong 25th anniversary promotion for the chain and will support a 3-D Meal Deal—a double-beef burger, drink and dessert—that includes a pair of 3-D glasses with purchase.

The company will lead into the campaign with print ads advising consumers to visit Burgerville units to pick up their glasses. Employes will wear 3-D buttons that read, appropriately, "You need glasses."

The two-month tv effort will begin with a 60-second spot, the first half shot normally, using company president George Propstra as spokesman.

Near the end of 30 seconds, Mr. Propstra will say, "Wouldn't it be more interesting to see this commercial in 3-D?" and then don a pair of glasses.

At that point, the screen will blur as it switches to 3-D, and the commercial will be replayed, with "more up-tempo music and a livelier reading" by Mr. Propstra, Burgerville vp-marketing Pat Klinger said.

Since Burgerville's ad budget is only about $1 million, Mr. Klinger believes it needs to take chances to get noticed. "Our budget is one-700th of McDonald's," he noted. "We have to do these things to stand out."

Borders, Perrin & Norrander, Portland, is Burgerville's agency. President-creative director Bill Borders supervised the campaign.

Bartles, Jaymes keep coolers hot

By JULIE FRANZ

Frank Bartles and Ed Jaymes have a lot of people to thank for their support.

The two pitchmen for E. & J. Gallo Winery's Bartles & Jaymes wine cooler, who traveled by bus to New York in tv spots this summer to bolster sales of their wine cooler, made an impact on consumers' recall of wine advertising, according to ADVERTISING AGE's August adWatch survey.

The poll shows that B&J's share of first mentions increased 3.5 percentage points to 12.2%, making it the best recalled wine advertiser during August.

Frank and Ed, who may visit other cities this fall in their Hal Riney-created campaign, sampled those funny donuts New Yorkers eat (bagels) and mortgaged Ed's house to buy the Brooklyn Bridge while visiting the Big Apple. The two have been touting B&J wine cooler since it was introduced more than two years ago.

The effort is part of Bartles & Jaymes' drive to remain the No. 1-selling cooler by pushing heavily in large cities. Included in the promotion is point-of-sale material designed specifically for use in bars.

California Cooler's $20 million "Real stuff" campaign also made waves in the August adWatch survey, boosting the brand's share of ad recall by 2.7 points to 5.1% of first mentions from the sample. That moved the brand into fourth position from fifth place in the July survey (when it captured 2.4% of first mentions).

The tv campaign delves into the product's heritage, depicting the California surfers and surfettes who first discovered the joy of mixing wine and fruit.

Holding down the No. 2 spot in the wine category (with 9.2% of first mentions) are E. & J. Gallo's Riney-created image spots—set to music by Vangelis, of "Chariots of Fire" fame—for Gallo's table wines. Riunite is third with 6.5% of first mentions; Paul Masson ranks prices shown in the chart that accompanies this article.

While ABC officials said their prices were substantially higher than listed here, extensive interviews with agency buyers disclosed that the chart's prices were far more accurate, except for Tuesday night, which the buyers said was still overstated by as much as $20,000 per 30-second unit. Despite this discrepancy, ABC's maximum potential weekly revenues still would top CBS.

The prices garnered by ABC indicate that buyers believe last year's No. 3-rated network can make a strong run at unseating CBS for second place. Apparently, ABC also was able to get exceptionally high prices on new shows. If the new shows do not perform up to ratings expectations, ABC could end up in a costly make-good situation. In the meantime, its revenues would have been far greater than earlier anticipated.

While it was expected that the average unit cost of network tv in 1986-87 would be flat compared with 1985, network tv nonetheless achieved several pricing milestones. Among them:

- Two shows have cracked $300,000 per 30-second spot. Both are NBC programs: "The Cosby Show," by far the most expensive at $380,000, and "Family Ties," at $300,000. The most expensive shows on ABC are "Moonlighting" and "Who's the Boss?" both at $215,000. CBS' most costly show is "60 Minutes," priced at $161,000, down from $195,000 last year.
- "Cosby" increased its price tag by $110,000, giving the series network tv's biggest price hike for the second consecutive year. The record drop for the year belongs to CBS' "Simon & Simon," plunging from $180,000 in 1985 to $78,000 this year.
- ABC's "Dynasty," the network's highest-price show last year at $235,000, dropped $57,000 per 30-second spot to $178,000, a 24.5% price cut.
- The richest nights of the week are Thursdays and Sundays, with combined network potential revenues of $15.2 million and $20.1 million, respectively. Prime time covers one hour more on Sundays than on the other nights of the week.
- In terms of revenue, NBC will win Thursday, Friday and Saturday. ABC will win Tuesday and Wednesday. CBS will win Sunday. Monday belongs to either ABC or NBC, depending on ABC's price tag for "Monday Night Football."
- If the networks consistently were to fetch these prices and sell out their inventories, the three-network total weekly prime time fourth-quarter revenue would be about $101 million. NBC would reap $37.9 million; ABC, $32.1 million, and CBS, $30.9 million.
- If the networks were to sell out all 6½ minutes of advertising per prime time hour (seven minutes in movies and 25 30-second units in "Monday Night Football"), and if they were to receive the rates shown in the accompanying chart, the maximum revenue potential for each network on a night-by-night basis would be:

Sunday: CBS, $7.4 million; ABC, $6.6 million; NBC, $6.1 million.

Monday: NBC, $5.3 million; ABC, $5.1 million-to-$5.6 million; CBS, $4.8 million.

Tuesday: ABC, $6.9 million; CBS, $3.3 million; NBC, $3.3 million.

Wednesday: ABC, $5.4 million; NBC, $4.5 million; CBS, $3.4 million.

Thursday: NBC, $8.6 million; CBS, $4.1 million; ABC, $2.6 million.

Friday: NBC, $5.4 million; CBS, $4.3 million; ABC, $2.5 million.

Saturday: NBC, $4.7 million; CBS, $3.6 million; ABC, $2.9 million.

The network prices also reflect pricing only during October and November, traditionally one of the highest-price periods of the broadcast year (April and May are similarly high price). Each network has different price "breaks" that reflect demand during a particular time of year—there can be as many as 30 such breaks during the course of a year.

For example, fourth-quarter prices "break" after Christmas, when advertiser demand softens.

In terms of revenue, NBC will win Thursday, Friday and Saturday. ABC will win Tuesday and Wednesday. CBS will win Sunday. Monday belongs to either ABC or NBC, depending on ABC's price tag for "Monday Night Football."

Recent upfront-pricing levels (AA, July 14) also differ from Ad Age's unit costs. To carve the largest share of the total upfront market, where advertisers buy inventory for the full year, both CBS and ABC cut cost-per-thousand prices slightly. (Advertisers negotiate cpms rather than strict unit costs.) Some major clients won deals on CBS at 5% lower rates than last year. Over-all pricing for the 1986-87 season was down about 1% on both ABC and CBS. Unit costs for the fourth quarter reflect this softness.

NBC booked a 20% gain in unit pricing for the fourth quarter. For the year, however, the network had a 3%-to-6% increase in cpms. The reason for the discrepancy: Thursday.

NBC's Thursday fall schedule is especially sought-after by motion picture advertisers, who want to be on tv's hit shows as they bring out their holiday releases. These advertisers clamor for the best placement on the best shows and will pay the freight. NBC's fourth-quarter Thursday average is substantially higher than the rest of the year. Some movie advertisers reportedly paid as much as $400,000 a 30-second spot for "Cosby" this fall.

Some other pricing discrepancies: ABC's "Monday Night Football" was sold for approximately $175,000 to most advertisers, however others paid as low as $135,000. Some buyers were surprised that ABC had a higher average price than CBS. The rankings could be different on a demographic basis, rather than total households as presented here. ABC would still be higher than CBS in adults 18 to 49 —the network's strongest demographic—while CBS likely would be higher for adult women, according to buyers. The buyers also said that ABC's "Monday Night Football" is generally considered sports rather than prime time inventory. Without "MNF," ABC's average prime time unit would drop to $109,000, still higher than CBS.#

Networks' 30-second price list, 1986-87 season

1986 network television unit costs reflect the average advertisers will pay during October and November, one of the highest priced periods of the broadcast year. Advertising Age's estimates reflect the average costs paid by several agencies. NBC-TV significantly widened the margin over its rivals on a cost-per-unit basis in 1985-86. For the first time ever, a regular series—"The Cosby Show"— was priced at $380,000. The strong night for ABC-TV is Tuesday and for CBS-TV, Sunday. *Eastern Time. New shows in gray. reality" in his work doesn't "gravitate to beautiful people" and slickly produced spots that lack creative ideas.

That may help him adapt to the midwestern agency climate.

"If the work is not, in your judgment, good enough, [a new job] is a tremendous challenge and potentially a disaster," he said.

Before joining LHS&B in January, 1984, Mr. DeGregorio was a creative director at McCann-Erickson in New York, where he created the "Coke is it" campaign for Coca-Cola Co. and worked on the Sony account.

He also has worked at BBDO and the Ogilvy Group's Scali, McCabe, Sloves in New York and worked briefly with Mr. O'Rielly on a Windsor Canadian whisky campaign while both were at Young & Rubicam.

Wim Slootweg, senior vp-general manager at O&M in Chicago, said two factors made the agency comfortable with its new hire: "Creatively, he's absolutely a powerhouse. But equally important, he's an awfully nice guy. He's not going to upset people; he's not going to be a bully" seeking to dictate creative edicts and "put a stamp on everything."

Mr. DeGregorio said he plans to juggle administrative assignments with creative work, particularly on the Sears business, for which O&M handles hard lines such as tools, appliances and electronics.

But "it would be unrealistic to say I'm going to do as much [creative] work as I do now." He also will become a member of O&M's new-business team with Mr. Slootweg and exec vp-managing director William Whitney.

Mr. DeGregorio's wife, Joan, and two daughters will join him in Chicago; the city-raised executive said he'll avoid the suburban life.

LHS&B vice-chairman, director of creative services Allan Beaver, who hired Mr. DeGregorio nearly three years ago, called him "a terrific talent" and said the new executive job "certainly changes your perspective on what you can do in your workday."

Mr. Beaver said he likely will replace Mr. DeGregorio soon from outside the agency.

TONY DeGREGORIO

Mr. DeGregorio may be saddest about leaving partner and vp-creative director Lee Garfinkel, who co-created the Subaru spots.

"We've had such a terrific collaboration," he said. "It's going to be a sad parting, because you get into these grooves with someone, and that's going to be a little hard to break."# fifth with 1.4% of first mentions.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb.

Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projected sample to name the advertising that first comes to mind—over-all and in a variety of product categories—from among all advertising seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days. During August, 1,000 consumers were polled by telephone.

Those changes in advertising awareness that are deemed statistically significant by adWatch researchers can be attributed to more than sample variation.

Ford Motor Co.'s continuing "Best-built American cars and trucks" theme helped pull the brand's advertising awareness out of a slump.

Those ads broke in June with a print campaign. In August, Ford added 4.3 points to its share of first mentions to boost its score to 22.7%. Ford's share had dropped 3.8 points to 18.4% of first mentions in July. Ford's advertising is still the most often mentioned auto advertising, followed by Chevrolet's 14.1% of first mentions; Toyota's 8.8%; Nissan's 4.8%, and General Motors' 4.4%.

August's 10 best-recalled ads (unaided by request for a specific product category) were, in descending order: Coca-Cola, Miller/Miller Lite, Pepsi-Cola, Ford, McDonald's, Budweiser/Bud Light (Anheuser-Busch), Bartles & Jaymes, K mart, Levi Strauss and 7UP.

New to the top 10 are Bartles & Jaymes, K mart, Levi Strauss and 7UP, bumping Marlboro, Jell-O and Coors, which had been among July's top 10.

Among other significant changes in advertising awareness during August:

- Eastman Kodak's advertising awareness gained 5.1 percentage points for a total of 27.4% of first mentions among camera advertisers. That accounts for the biggest gain in awareness in the August adWatch poll. Canon's advertising remained in second with 12.7%, followed by Minolta with 5.7% of first mentions.
- Advertising for American Tobacco's Carlton cigaret brand ("If you smoke, please try Carlton") made its first appearance among the top five tobacco advertisers, placing fourth with 1.9% of first mentions.

The brand's advertising garnered 1.3% of first mentions in July. Philip Morris Inc.'s Marlboro remains the leader in the tobacco category with 7.9% of first mentions (unchanged from the previous month). United States Tobacco Co.'s Skoal smokeless tobacco is second with 3.9% and RJR Nabisco's Winston is third with 2.7% of first mentions.#

Do you think P&G's "punishment" of the Saatchi & Saatchi agency network will encourage other clients to take a tougher stance on account conflicts, in effect reversing the trend toward a more liberal attitude?

E. HARRIS

Elizabeth Harris, president/creative director, Harris-Edward, Philadelphia: It's all right to resign an account because of a conflict. Clients should look at the quality of the creative rather than conflicts. After the shakeup, P&G will still have to find an agency as good as Saatchi & Saatchi. Agencies like Saatchi have gotten there because they're that good; that's what clients should be thinking of. Now where will P&G go? They'll have to look hard to find another big agency not affected by mergers.

J. DURFEE

Jim Durfee, creative director, Durfee & Solow Advertising, New York: In our business particularly, we're a world of follow-the-leaders. There has been a lot of re-evaluating going on among advertisers, and who better to follow than P&G? It may not be a long-term phenomenon, but in the short term, yes, it could help other re-evaluations to occur.

R. BADAMI

Richard Badami, exec vp, Phillips-Ramsey, Los Angeles: A company of P&G's clout and influence sets the tone for our business. A lot of other advertisers may be thinking, "Maybe P&G knows something we don't know." The so-called "liberal attitude" is an attempt by the agencies to justify the merger moves to the clients. Obviously, this client isn't buying it. P&G must have looked at the situation and thought the merger would be a liability and not an asset. I don't think P&G wouldn't have made the change.

S. RICHARDS

Stan Richards, creative director, Richards Group, Dallas: I think liberalization of the conflict issue will continue, in spite of what may have happened between any one agency and its client. The trend toward mega-agencies will continue, and those agencies are not going to walk away from substantial pieces of business every time they merge. Also, a lot of times clients use conflict as a way to justify an agency change when that is not the heart of the matter.

D. SULLIVAN

Donald Sullivan, general manager, J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago: P&G always has had the most rigid definition of client conflicts and I don't think other companies will move in the same direction. Now, there are fewer agencies to choose from, and if you enact [a P&G-type] policy, you'll lose agencies in your stable. I think clients will maintain their policies, because more restrictive policies are not in their best interest. Clients won't change their policies just because the Saatchis would like them to.

Kraft brand shifts mark new strategy

Agency layoffs, tighter budgets are here to stay

By STEWART ALTER
News Analysis

NEW YORK—The layoff of about 60 employes at Ogilvy & Mather and the revision of Kraft Inc.'s agency compensation system were further signs last week that disinflation and flattened ad spending are having as much of an impact on the ad-agency business this year as megamergers.

Perhaps most significant, major agency heads do not see the current economy-related staff cutbacks or compensation pressures as cyclical and temporary. Instead, they talk about fundamental changes in the way the agency business is structured in account staffing, services provided to clients and compensation arrangements. More efficiency in creating effective advertising, less bureaucracy and more profitability are the rallying cries.

"The business has changed. Anybody who thinks it can go back to the way it was is smoking grass,"

CHICAGO—Changes in top management and strategic thinking at Kraft Inc. over the past few years—including a growing emphasis on product rather than corporate advertising—were behind its shift of $125 million in advertising assignments.

Sears consolidation at Ogilvy reflects shift to local marketing. Story on Page 117.

Two agencies—DDB Needham Worldwide and N W Ayer—were removed from Kraft's roster last week, and billings were cut to $75 million from nearly $175 million at J. Walter Thompson Co., which has worked for and been closely associated with Kraft for 64 years. It originated the line, "America spells cheese, K—R—A—F—T."

Major winners in the agency shuffle were Leo Burnett Co., Foote, Cone & Belding, Geers Gross Advertising and Young & Rubicam.

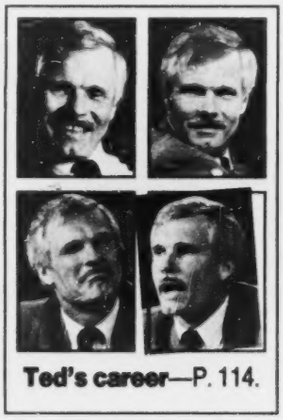
MANAGERS TAKE OVER TBS HELM

By VERNE GAY

Ted Turner, one of the most flamboyant, hands-on executives ever, has turned over the management of Turner Broadcasting System to a five-man management committee comprised of veteran TBS executives.

While Mr. Turner will retain his titles as chairman-president of TBS, he will now participate only in major corporate decisions. The five-man executive committee, now facing perhaps the most difficult financial period in the company's history, will oversee virtually all operations of the company, including finance, programing and marketing.



Ted's career—P. 114.

The management committee includes Robert Wussler, 50, TBS exec vp and a former CBS network president; Jack Petrik, 56, exec vp-general manager of Superstation WTBS who is heavily involved in long-range program planning and managing the MGM film library; William Bevins Jr., 40, vp-finance who structured much of the TBS acquisition of MGM; Gerald Hogan, 40, vp-broadcasting sales and Turner's main contact with the advertising community, and Terence McGuirk, 35, vp-special projects who oversees legal and cable matters.

The establishment of an independent management group at TBS represents a remarkable turnaround for Mr. Turner, who with bravado and flashes of brilliance built TBS from a near-bankrupt company in 1963 to one with estimated 1986 revenues of $500 million.

TBS must retire $600 million in debt associated with the MGM purchase by December and faces another $130 million in debt payments next year. The recent sale of the MGM studios and other assets for $490 million will partly cover the December payment.

Mr. Turner began forming the committee a few weeks ago and, according to sources, the plan has been revised at least three times. The precise purpose, direction and authority of the group is "still taking focus," according to one source.

Mr. Turner is expected to spend more time on outside interests, including the Better World Society, a nonprofit, Washington-based organization that makes "advocacy" tv programs for TBS about pollution, overpopulation and nuclear proliferation. Mr. Turner is a founding member and chairman of the organization.

Mr. Turner also is expected to step up his globe-trotting activities in an all-out effort to build CNN's worldwide distribution.

Mr. Turner's personal life has also reportedly played a role in his decision to turn over day-to-day operations of TBS to the committee. Mr. Turner reportedly has separated from his wife, Jane, and, several sources said, he has become tired of 20-hour workdays and wants to devote more time to his personal life and outside interests.

A TBS spokesman said establishment of the new management committee had nothing to do with Mr. Turner's personal life.

He said Mr. Turner has wanted to relieve "the crush" of business activities on him since the TBS acquisition of MGM last Au-

Pillsbury talks cake with DMB&B, McCann, Y&R

MINNEAPOLIS—Pillsbury has approached several agencies, including New York shops D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, McCann-Erickson and Young & Rubicam, to handle its $15 million cake and frosting account, sources say. BBDO Worldwide, Chicago, resigned the business due to Omnicom merger conflicts (AA, Aug. 4). Pillsbury also is looking for a new agency for its $15 million-to-$25 million microwave-products assignment, still at BBDO.

Minolta's focus narrows to 6 agencies

RAMSEY, N.J.—Minolta last week narrowed the competition for its estimated $20 million photography account to six New York agencies: Ammirati & Puris; Backer & Spielvogel; Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt; DDB Needham Worldwide; incumbent William Esty Co., and Jordan, Manning, Case, Taylor & McGrath. BJK&E now handles Minolta's estimated $10 million office equipment account, as well as pr for both consumer and business divisions. DDB Needham handles the $60,000 Cokin camera lenses and accessories account. A decision is expected by early December.

The making of Spectra 4
The success of the Spectra instant photography system is concrete evidence that the marketing and engineering departments at Polaroid Corp. have come a long way toward communicating on the same level. Although both are part of the Polaroid "family"—a term not taken lightly by company employes—the marketing and engineering departments did not understand each other at all when they started collaborating on a new camera.

BBDO gives 'humane' feel to Apple ads

By CLEVELAND HORTON

Apple Computer is dropping hard sell for heart sell in 11 bold new commercials from BBDO Worldwide.

In spots in the tradition of BBDO's "feel good" award-winning work for Pepsi-Cola Co., the Cupertino, Cal.-based computer company is projecting a "more humane" approach in selling Macintosh and Apple II personal computers.

"The power to be your best" is the new tv and print theme.

Among the new spots:

- "Put Mac in" uses quick-cut imagery to show business people sucessfully using the Mac in offices. With a 100-piece orchestra performing original music on the sound track, the spot shows workers of all ages and ranks excelling with the Mac.
- "Momentum series," a collection of four spots, doesn't show or mention the Mac until the last frame, a first for the pc industry, said Apple advertising and sales-promotion manager Eruce Mowery.

In one commercial, executives watch two junior employes (identified as "hot shots from finance") carrying computers from their homes to the office. What brand are they? The last frame

Dallas dailies' war escalates

By TOM BAYER

DALLAS—The Dallas Times Herald has sent the Audit Bureau of Circulations what it says is evidence of shady circulation practices at the rival Dallas Morning News. And the Morning News has turned over to the ABC evidence it believes will cause an investigation of the Times Herald's circulation department, sources close to both papers said last week.

William Dean Singleton, who bought the Times Herald from Los Angeles-based Times Mirror Co. this summer, fired the first shot when he brought in lawyers from Cleveland to look for evidence of circulation fraud at the Morning News. They reportedly turned up questionable circulation practices, which were described in a lengthy memorandum sent to ABC headquarters in Schaumburg, Ill.

The Morning News, which sources say was aware of the Times Herald's private investigation, launched a probe of its own. That investigation is said to have yielded evidence—including videotapes—that, if accepted by the ABC, could slash up to 25,000 from the Times Herald's circulation numbers.

Mr. Singleton would not confirm that his paper has requested the ABC investigation. He also refused to discuss the Times Herald's own circulation. Likewise, Morning News officials declined to com-

Local business books consolidating

ACBJ buy, ad combine latest moves

By GARY LEVIN

American City Business Journals' $40 million acquisition of Business Journal Publishing Co., St. Louis, further consolidates ownership in the growing business-weekly segment as local media ad growth continues to outpace that of national media.

Publicly held ACBJ, based in Kansas City, Mo., adds six titles to its growing stable of 19 business weeklies owned or managed by the company. Combined circulation for the group is 324,741, according to the company. The publications to be acquired by Nov. 15 are in Baltimore, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and St. Louis.

Additionally, ACBJ and Scripps Howard Jan. 1 jointly will create the Weekly Business Journal Advertising Network, a Kansas City-based network to help attract national advertisers.

"This particular niche industry is a very good business to be in," said ACBJ chairman Michael Russell, adding that revenues from weeklies more than two years old are up 9% this year while the national media climate remains flat.

"It had been fragmented as far as ownership is concerned, and we found a lot of the things we learned in running [our] business can work all over." While most business operations are decentralized, editorial similarities include advertiser-targeted themed sections and rankings of local businesses, both staples of that publishing segment.

ACBJ already owns six titles and manages 13 others held by its principals, including Mr. Russell. Those 13 will be folded into the public company as they become profitable, he said.

The company was formed only four years ago with the Kansas City Business Journal, which has a paid circulation of 14,396, the largest among ACBJ's titles. The largest among the Business Journal group is in St. Louis, where the weekly circulates 19,064 paid copies.

Business Journal president Mark Vittert has been offered a position on ACBJ's board; he could not be reached for comment on his future plans.

Other personnel will remain intact, Mr. Russell said; no decisions have been made regarding format changes.

Mr. Russell said 10 ACBJ titles have been acquired or launched since 1985, illustrating the growing attraction of local business publishing ventures.

In response to the recent growth, many major daily newspapers have increased their business coverage. And while some dailies are "embarrassed" when weeklies break major stories, Mr. Russell believes they've reaped financial rewards from the new advertising market created by business papers.

The Assn. of Area Business Publications reports 97 members—including 64 tabloids—compared with 17 in 1979. Combined circulation for those publications is 2.1 million.

J. Kendrick Noble, analyst at PaineWebber in New York, said weekly business tabloid publishers have fared especially well in the general trend toward more specialized media.

Mr. Noble said the uncertain impact of recent tax-reform legislation has made many national business-to-business advertisers skittish, and may lead to further erosion among national business magazines such as Business Week, Forbes and Fortune. Each has reported significant year-to-date ad-page declines.

Local business weeklies, however, rely more upon local, more targeted advertisers such as healthcare, telephone and business service companies less affected by changes in the economy, Mr. Noble said. "The long-term prospects are excellent."

Major national advertisers have mostly avoided these titles because of difficulty in buying large groups of papers and because of what observers called uneven editorial quality. The proposed Weekly Business Journal Advertising Network, joining Scripps' 10 titles with ACBJ's 25, is meant to reverse that trend.

"Frankly, we've done a very poor job on national sales, and what little we've done has been regional buys," said ACBJ vice-chairman Bill Worley. "[The market's] been so fragmented, we think if we stroll in with 40-plus journals, it'll be easier for agencies to buy into the market."

Ad-page performance this year has been varied, with growth mainly dependent on local market conditions. At ACBJ's Kansas City paper, ad pages through August of this year were down 13.9%, while those at Business Journal's Indianapolis paper were up 23.7%, according to reports from both weeklies.

Other companies in the burgeoning field include Cincinnati-based Scripps Howard, whose 10 titles have a mostly nonpaid combined circulation of 254,837, and Crain Communications, which publishes business weeklies in Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit and New York, in addition to Advertising Age.

Crain's Chicago Business, perhaps the largest business weekly with paid circulation of 42,249, was started in 1978.

Few markets have supported more than one business weekly despite the industry's growth, with the exception of more feature-oriented titles such as Manhattan, inc. in New York and Regardie's in Washington.

In Dallas, Denver, New York and Pittsburgh, major publishers have acquired and folded other competing publications to ensure their own profitability. "Only one will have the financial wherewithal to stay with it," Mr. Russell said.#

> "Frankly, we've done a very poor job on national sales, and what little we've done has been regional buys. [The market's] been so fragmented, we think if we stroll in with 40-plus journals, it'll be easier for agencies to buy into the market."

CORRECTIONS & CLARIFICATIONS

- Gardner Advertising, St. Louis, supplied the wrong credits for the "How to repair your Nynex Yellow Pages" ad for Southwestern Bell Media, shown in the Best of Press feature (AA, Sept. 8, P. 56). The correct copywriter was Frank Oros and the art director was Marty Chapo.
- The turn-of-the-century boardwalk on which a Planters peanut commercial was filmed is located in Victorian-tinged Ocean Grove, N.J., not at the gambling mecca of Atlantic City, 100 miles to the south (AA, Sept. 15, P. 34).
- In an article on Courvoisier cognac (AA, Sept. 22, P. 54), two titles in the creative credits at J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, were transposed. Jim Patterson is exec vp-executive creative director, who served as copywriter on the campaign with Mary Warner, copywriter.
- The former agency for Equitable Life Assurance Society was D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, not Ally Gargano/MCA, as reported (AA, Sept. 29, P. 8).
- The following are corrections for profiles appearing in the 100 Top Media Cos. issue appearing June 30:

In the profile on Dow Jones & Co. (P. S-30), it was mentioned that DJ hopes its own and Telerate's data eventually may be accessible to home users and small companies worldwide. Such data have been available to such users for some time. Dow Jones also sold about 65% of its 24.5% interest in Continental Cablevision back to Continental, not 8% of its 25% as reported. The Wall Street Journal, which is proceeding with its front-end pagination, was not held up in its plan to construct a plant in Oklahoma City because of the ban on liquor advertising, as stated. DJ officials say by the time DJ was ready to break ground on the plant, the court had ruled against the law.

McCall Publishing Co. did not buy a cable tv system as mentioned in a chart (P. S-70).#

Cooler success freezes out most competitors

By Harvey M. Lederman

Who could have predicted that a backyard business started by two childhood friends, who each invested $5,000 in the venture, would evolve into the $1 billion-plus wine cooler industry? Certainly not Stuart Sewley and Michael Crete, the two partners who founded California Cooler Co., Stockton, Cal., just five years ago.

When California Cooler began peddling its wine cooler, the competition was sparse and far from formidable. By the first quarter of this year, however, the world's largest winery, brewery and distillery were all vying for the top spot and all three were holding fat bankrolls. And California Cooler, purchased by Brown-Forman Corp., Louisville, Ky., last September for $55 million plus future payments that could total another $83 million, also was poised and ready to spend heavy ad dollars.

Harvey M. Lederman, former managing editor of Liquor Store, New York, has covered the cooler craze since its inception.

By spending anywhere from an estimated $20 million to $30 million on advertising, E&J Gallo Winery, Anheuser-Busch, Joseph E. Seagram & Sons and Brown-Forman collectively have made the cooler business a high stakes game.

Cooler marketers and industry observers are confident the category will continue to grow steadily for the next few years.

Jon G. Fredrikson, president of Gomberg, Fredrikson & Associates, San Francisco, a consultant to the wine industry, estimates 60 million to 65 million cases of coolers—including malt-based coolers—will have been sold by year's end, up from 41 million cases in 1985.

But he and several cooler marketers caution that the price of entry—as well as the price of competing—is growing higher each day.

"I think consumers will stick with image-driven brands and I think you may see a proliferation of packages, sizes and flavors," says Jon Gardner, California Cooler's marketing director. He sees room in the market for so-called niche brands but says the cost of entry at this stage would be staggering.

Despite all indications to the contrary, a few naysayers—i.e. Bert Notarius Premier Liquor Buffalo, N.Y.—believe coolers will prove to be as faddish a product as pop wines, such as Boone's Farm, were in their heyday. Cooler marketers disagree.

"The coolers fill a very important and clearly perceived need," says Robert Huntington, vp-marketing planning at Canandaigua Wine Co., Canandaigua, N.Y. "They provide some very real and very important benefits in relation to changing cultural, social trends and legal imperatives.

"The pop wines represented more of a social statement by a transitory and rebellious young population group who embraced pop wines as something they had discovered as their own drink," Mr. Huntington says.

Coolers, however, meet the needs of an American populace that has grown increasingly more concerned about diet, health and fitness. With their lighter taste and lower alcohol content, coolers are being embraced by a true demographic cross-section of the population. Further, the sweet taste of a cooler doesn't require the new drinker to acquire a taste for the product, as is the case with beer and liquor.

Recognizing the appeal of wine coolers, several brewers entered the market with malt-based products. To date, only Stroh's White Mountain cooler has shown any real success and a significant share of its sales—estimated as high as one-third by some industry experts—is coming from states where it has a tax and distribution advantage over wine coolers. Several states, like Pennsylvania—White Mountain's leading market—bar the sale of wine-based products in supermarkets and other food stores.

Mr. Fredrikson says it would not be inconceivable for Anheuser-Busch or Adolph Coors Co. to introduce malt-based coolers. A-B is struggling with its Baybry's champagne cooler and is spending more than $20 million to support its low-calorie wine cooler entry, Dewey Stevens. Coors had introduced a brand named Colorado Chiller, which froze in test market.

With the cooler market expanding to include malt-based products and, more recently, Seagram's spirits-based Golden Spirits line, the question of what constitutes a cooler needs to be answered. Gallo reportedly is trying to do just that by having the federal government stipulate that only wine coolers should be labeled coolers.

"The fact that now we have wine, beer and spirits coolers at similar alcohol levels but taxed differently at the federal and state levels tells me that at some point it may all change," Mr. Fredrikson says.

What has changed is the attitude of the key liquor retailers and supermarket chains; they now recognize that the category is permanent, not seasonal. Many retailers have sharply

My ad manager stinks!

Yes, he gets my ads written in time to meet closing dates (barely!).
Sure, he sees to all the "details" that are part of getting ads placed properly.

BUT...

I ask for an ad that lets the public know I will beat or match the best prices in the Screenprinted Sportswear Industry.
He gives me a phrase like "competitively priced".

I want him to tell folks about our excellent record with time-critical deliveries.
His copy reads "Fast service".

I want him to assure people that no one, no where prints t-shirts better.
All he can come up with is "fine quality".

I tell him he's dull...
He tells me I don't know squat about advertising.

Brewers

White Mountain, I.C. and LaCroix show how brewers successfully have latched onto the wine industry's trend.

In the past, brewers tried to promote malt-based coolers—Pittsburgh Brewing tried Hopp 'N Gator and Anheuser-Busch brewed Chelsea—and failed.

Champale, a flavored malt-liquor, could be considered the original malt cooler, but has never been marketed in that category. However, last spring Trenton, N.J.-based Champale Inc. introduced Champale coolers in four fruit flavors. North Castle Partners, Greenwich, Conn., handles.

Adolph Coors Co., Golden, Colo., suspended testing of its Colorado Chiller malt-based cooler in October, 1985. Some observers say the product failed because it tasted too much like beer. A Coors spokeswoman says the company stopped the tests when there was a seasonal downturn in the cooler market, but Coors continues to examine the market.

More brewers are likely to jump into the cooler category. "I expect every major brewer has a cooler or one in the making—you just haven't seen them yet," Pittsburgh Brewing's Mr. LaLonde says.

Coolers

pared the number of cooler brands they stock, often carrying only the top five or six and perhaps a couple of regional or specialized brands like Franzia's white zinfandel real wine cooler.

The cooler shakeout, as such, began in earnest early this summer. "Basically, there was a shakeout as soon as [retailers] made the decision that there's only so much room on the shelves and retailers can only give so much space," says Dan Hughes, corporate alcoholic beverage merchandiser for Safeway Stores, Oakland, Cal. Safeway closed out several brands this summer, Mr. Hughes says, including Citronet from Heublein Wines and Dubonnet Splash from Schenley Distillers. "Based on all the closeouts and what they've been doing," he says, "next summer will be even bigger [more volume] than this one."

Next summer is on everyone's mind, but nobody knows just how big is bigger. What cooler marketers and industry experts do know, however, is that coolers probably will not peak as a category for another few years.

"The category has grown and matured to the point now where the trade has accepted the category as being very important," Canandaigua's Mr. Huntington says. "They have greatly increased the space allocated [to coolers] on the shelves and in the cold boxes and in the floor display space, and they've also become very selective in terms of the brands they carry."

Retailers also have accepted coolers as a product that sells after Labor Day and before Memorial Day. Although cooler sales drop during the colder months—1985 sales in nonsummer months were about 30% to 40% of the summer peak—the seasonality curve has been flattening out from year to year. This year, offseason sales are expected to be about 40% to 50% of peak sales. Beer sales during the winter, in comparison, are about 75% of summer sales.

Mr. Huntington sees a lot of activity next year, with much brand switching by consumers. "The stakes are getting so damn large and the category hasn't matured yet and consumer brand preferences haven't settled," he says. "It's still a very fluid market in terms of the consumer's willingness to experiment and try other brands. I don't expect the category to mature next year, but how high is up is a guessing game for all of us."

Adds Mr. Fredrikson: "The growth rate has to slow, but I think the category is going to continue to grow and be a significant factor. We can't lose sight that this is a beer/adult soft drink-type product that can only be measured in terms of the 5.7 billion gallon beer market or the 11 billion gallon soft drink market. So getting up into the quarter-billion-gallon range is nothing, that would only be 5% of the beer market."

Smaller shop payroll costs double

By STEWART ALTER

Direct hourly payroll costs in the average small-to-mid-size agency just about doubled between 1977 and 1985, according to an analysis by a company that specializes in advertising agency computer and cost-accounting systems.

BCS/Profit Index Systems, which drew information from its database covering 113 agencies nationwide, said the increase was in line with inflation. The agencies, only 13 of which are in New York, include shops with billings between $10 million and $100 million.

Average direct client per-hour cost, the study showed, rose to $21.28 in 1985 from $11.60 in 1977.

"If you look at the increase in hourly salary costs, by departments, over the past few years, you get a handle on agency profit problems that very few agency clients understand," said H.E. McDonald, vp of Anaheim, Cal.-based BCS/PIS.

"From a client standpoint, the costs of media space and time and production have gone up. So, in raw dollars, agency gross income from commissions also has increased."

The BCS/PIS figures look at salary costs, broken out on an hourly basis, by different functions and departments within an agency. The hourly rate figures quoted do not include allowance for overhead or bonuses, but do include payroll tax and group insurance.

The largest average increases are in the creative areas—copy and art, and broadcast and print production.

Hourly salary cost figures from 1977 and 1985 show a 191.9% increase for broadcast production to $24.05, a 100.2% boost for print production to $16.80, a 92.4% rise for copy to $28.59 and an 80.1% increase for art to $20.98.

Media salary increase also rose substantially, by 108.6% to $16.54 an hour. Other departmental hourly salary cost increases came to 78.4% for pr to $17.54, 73.7% for contact people (account service) to $24.42, 67.9% for general office/accounting to $10.16, 61.9% for market research to $21.12, and 29.7% for executive/administrative to $36.62.

If the 1977 weighted grand total hourly salary cost of $11.62 is adjusted just by inflation, via the Consumer Price Index, it would come to $20.49 in 1985. That "agrees almost to the penny" with the $20.51 1985 weighted grand total average hourly cost, covering all functions and all departments, which the BCS/PISI study produced, said Mr. McDonald.#

Few withhold free-lance tax payments

MILWAUKEE—The vast majority of advertising agencies who contract for free-lance talent and artists do not withhold federal income tax, Social Security or state income tax and do not make unemployment compensation payments, according to a nationwide study conducted by Marquette University.

The study's conclusions will be used as evidence in an investigation by the Internal Revenue Service and the Wisconsin Unemployment Compensation Board that seeks to determine whether free-lance workers should be considered employes or independent contractors.

The case involves the free-lance hiring practices of Pyramid Pictures, a production company with offices in Milwaukee and Hollywood. After an unemployment compensation audit, the state determined that Pyramid's free lancers were employes, and the company was told to make back tax payments. Pyramid maintains that treating free lancers as independent contractors is a standard practice.

The Marquette study, commissioned by the Milwaukee Assn. of Advertising Agencies, found that 92% of the 526 agencies questioned do not withhold federal income taxes or Social Security from free lancers.#

This data has been provided by Media Records for exclusive publication in Advertising Age and may not be reprinted or published in any form without explicit permission from Media Records. All newspapers represented are subscribers to Media Records. For those newspapers that subscribe to Media Records National Advertising Reporting Service, Total Advertising data shown has been supplied by the publisher to Media Records and included in this compilation. All publisher supplied figures are converted to MRCS SAU inches by Media Records. Those newspapers are indicated with an asterisk (*).

REPORTING METHODOLOGY

Media Records continues to measure in linage but due to the introduction of the SAU 6 column format Media Records has designed and developed a methodology with the approval of our subscribers, the INAME Measurements Committee, The ANPA/NAB Working Committee, The AAAA Newspaper Committee, and other industry groups.

The approved methodology is titled The Media Records Conversion System (MRCS) and is based upon the printed page area of each product of the newspaper and is a five step approach as follows:

1. Measure Printed Page
   Width and Depth in Inches
2. Determine Square Inches of Page
   Multiply Width by Depth Inches
3. Determine the Number of SAU Inches of Page
   Divide the Square Inches by 2.0625 (SAU Inches)
4. Measure the Total Lines of the Page
   Multiply Column Depth Agate Lines by the Number of Columns on the Page
5. Determine the Factor for Converting Measured Lines to Reported SAU Inches

Owners look overseas

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

The founder of the U.S. Football League held a secret meeting in New Orleans Oct. 7 with 14 potential franchise owners of a new spring football league that would include a team in London.

In a departure from custom, the American Football Teams Inc. league, the brainchild of USFL founder and New Orleans art and antiques dealer David Dixon, would permit the drafting of five high school seniors per franchise. A second meeting is set for Oct. 21 in Chicago, with each potential owner required to pay a $20,000 entrance fee to bid on franchises costing $2.5 million each. At least seven potential owners have agreed to attend the second meeting.

Discussions at the New Orleans meeting included the naming of candidates for league commissioner.

In addition to Mr. Dixon, the potential owners considered Jerry Solomon, vp-general manager, Busch Media Group, New York, Anheuser-Busch's in-house media buying service; Mike Trager, chairman, Sports Marketing & Television International, Greenwich, Conn., and a former top sports sales executive at NBC-TV, and Jim Spence, former vp at ABC Sports, who heads his own company, Sports Television International, New York.

None of the three candidates attended the meeting, nor have they been officially contacted by the AFT.

Among the potential investors attending the Oct. 7 meeting were:

- Rick Kulis, a representative of fight promoter Bob Arum and middleweight champion "Marvelous" Marvin Hagler for the option on the Boston franchise.
- Peter Pocklington, the Canadian financier and owner of the Edmonton Oilers of the National Hockey League, who would have the option on the London franchise.
- Jim Abernethy, the brash 29-year-old multimillionaire Atlanta promoter who has options on the Orlando and Dallas franchises.
- Neal Gunn and Bob Harter, the top executives of the Houston Sports Assn., owners of the Astrodome and the Houston Astros, who have the option on the Houston franchise.
- Ron Blanding, owner of the USFL Denver Gold, who has the option on the San Francisco fran-

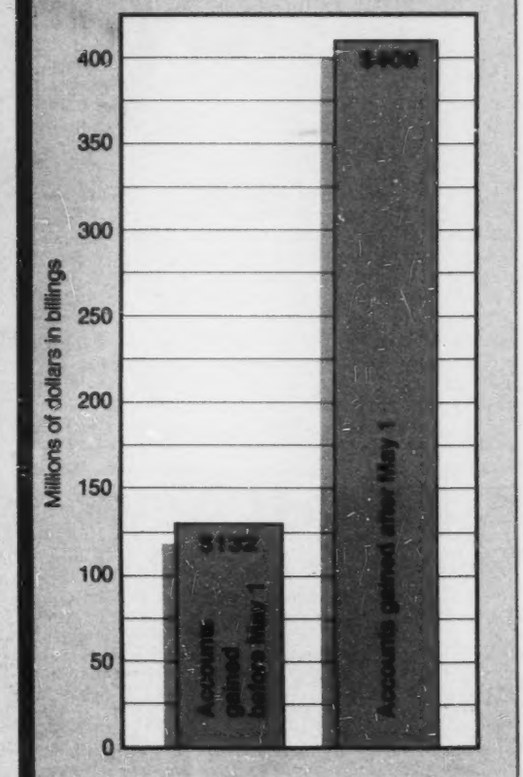
Y&R's 1986 gains

Young & Rubicam, New York, last week picked up $27 million in new business from Minneapolis-based Pillsbury Co., bringing its total wins for 1986 to $541 million. Of that, more than $100 million was a result of the Saatchi/Bates and Omnicom mergers. Another $250 million in new accounts, including some merger fallout, came from existing clients. Changes made after May 1 are considered post-merger. Source: Advertising Age estimates. (See story on Page 12.)



GF tries triple play in prepared foods

By JUDANN DAGNOLI

General Foods is posing a triple threat to marketers in the $3 billion prepared dinner and entree market: It is simultaneously testing entries into the shelf-stable, refrigerated and frozen segments.

And the no-holds-barred effort in a business dominated by Nestle Enterprises' Stouffer Foods, Solon, O., and Campbell Soup Co., Camden, N.J., puts the White Plains, N.Y., marketer in the forefront in developing two of those segments, nonrefrigerated shelf-stable and refrigerated.

With its three-pronged approach, GF clearly has set its sights on penetrating the prepared dinner market. "In the best of all possible worlds, we would go ahead with all of these efforts," a GF official said. Two other major food companies—General Mills and Pillsbury Co.—are also said to be racing to enter those emerging segments.

The rush of new items in this market is likely to boost ad spending to more than $100 million annually.

GF is exploring the shelf-stable segment with its test of Impromptu (AA, Oct. 6), a prepared dinner line without preservatives that maintains a shelf life of one year without refrigeration or freezing. Impromptu is now in Portland, Me., and Evansville, Ind.

At the same time, GF is testing in upscale stores in the New York metropolitan area an ultra-upscale, high-price refrigerated dinner called Culinova. The project is atypical of the mass-marketed, huge-volume businesses that GF traditionally seeks; Culinova is being referred to as a "takeout gourmet dinner."

GF earlier this year entered test in Rockford and other markets with Birds Eye Fresh Creations (AA, March 13),

Saatchi rumbles with merger talk

By STEWART ALTER

The advertising world may be in for some more Saatchi shocks.

In its fiscal year that just ended, London-based Saatchi & Saatchi Co. shook up the industry with acquisitions and their ensuing fallout. Now, for fiscal 1987, Saatchi is looking at possible agency combinations and consolidations.

One possibility reported to be under serious consideration is a merger of New York-based Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide and Ted Bates Worldwide.

This does not mean such a merger will happen, but the fact it was being seriously evaluated—an event confirmed by numerous industry sources—demonstrates how Saatchi's approach to its acquisitions allows for even the most dramatic possibilities.

Bottom-line needs in the new fiscal year that began Oct. 1, and the need to build a strong "worldwide brand" agency, dictate that some consolidation is likely in New York, where Saatchi owns 11 general-advertising agencies, all operating under different names.

These considerations lent credibility to a rumor last week that Compton, Bates and Backer & Spielvogel would be merged by month's end to form an agency called simply Saatchi & Saatchi. Revenue losses of 10% to 15%, generated by account fallout from such a mega-merger's client conflicts, would be more than offset by cost savings in the 30%-to-40% range, the story goes, as Saatchi cuts overlapping staffs and consolidated of-

Last Minute News

Jacoby has 'last day'

NEW YORK—Robert Jacoby, who reportedly on advice of counsel continued to show up each day for work even after having been ousted as chairman-ceo of Ted Bates Worldwide (AA, Sept. 22, et seq.), made Oct. 9 his "last day in the office," his secretary said. It was not clear whether that meant he had settled his contract with Bates parent Saatchi & Saatchi Co.; neither he nor Bates spokesmen were available for comment. There also was no word as to the impact of this on his Four A's chairmanship.

HHCC 'defers' going public

BOSTON—Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, exploring the idea of going public (AA, April 7), has "deferred its decision indefinitely" on that subject, citing the "unevenness in the stock market" and the particularly uneven performance of ad agency stocks. HHCC will

Football league springs forward 1
The founder of the U.S. Football League held a secret meeting in New Orleans Oct. 7 with 14 potential franchise owners of a new spring football league that would include a team in London. The American Football Teams Inc. league would permit the drafting of five high school seniors per franchise.

Burger wars beckon 3
Just a year after Burger King abandoned hard-hitting comparative claims for quality and image-oriented advertising, the No. 2 fast-food chain has returned to the battle of the burgers with the first of several ad flights that start to attack leader McDonald's.

Seven-Up ad situation stable 6
When Dr Pepper president John Albers adds the Seven-Up presidency to his duties in several weeks, he plans to retain Seven-Up's agency and will keep 1987 ad spending at 1986's $50 million level.

Pillsbury guards "major" status 12
Pillsbury Co. last week became the latest major advertiser to send a strong signal that it will not compromise its insistence on being a "major client" at each of its agencies. It reassigned all $30 million of its business previously at BBDO Worldwide, rather than just the $15 million cake and frostings business the agency had resigned due to conflict pressure from General Mills.

Personal care leads growth at S.C. Johnson

By LAURIE FREEMAN

RACINE, WIS.—S.C. Johnson & Son's initial success in the lucrative $3.2 billion haircare and $505 million skincare categories has convinced the company its future growth lies more in these growing personal-care markets than in the maturing homecare and insecticide businesses.

While the company remains anchored by the strength of its furniture polishes, floor waxes and Raid, the leader in the $637 million insecticide category, sales in those markets are declining 1% to 3% annually.

Personal-care sales, however, are increasing 3% to 5% a year, said Jim Wallace, national sales manager-personal products.

The charge into these hotly competitive markets is being led by Charles J. Goldthwaite Jr., vp-general manager of U.S. Consumer Products-Personal Care, recruited from Chesebrough-Pond's three years ago to help the $2 billion, privately held Johnson through the personal-care mine field.

His experience largely has been in haircare and skincare, the first two categories on Johnson's hit list.

"When compared to [Procter & Gamble's] Ivory and [Chesebrough-Pond's] Vaseline Intensive Care, we're definitely the young kids on the block. But our advantage is we're going in only when we have something new, not a me-too product," Mr. Goldthwaite said in an interview here last week.

Despite its recent arrival on the personal-care block, Johnson already is making its elders slightly uncomfortable.

Largely through the $10 million launch two years ago of Curel moisturizing lotion (AA, Oct. 8, '84), Johnson has become a serious competitor in this $505 million category.

Between Curel, a therapeutic entry with a 7.6% share, and Soft Sense with vitamin E, a cosmetic skin lotion, the company holds a 12.9% share, up 1.4 share points since last year.

Bad blood rises over circulation

The newest circulation street fight between Dallas' two daily newspapers is perplexing major advertisers, who thought this city's newspaper wars had cooled when the underdog Times Herald was sold to William Dean Singleton this summer for $110 million.

The latest skirmish was instigated by disclosures that the Times Herald had sent the Audit Bureau of Circulations what it calls evidence of the rival Morning News' overstatement of its circulation by about 25,000 copies daily (AA, Oct. 6).

The News, in turn, supplied the ABC with material it says proves that the Times Herald is inflating its own circulation figures.

Major advertisers, who would not speak for attribution, seemed stunned that the Times Herald would initiate a circulation fracas. Privately, they questioned its credibility.

One source said some advertisers have been calling the News

Food industry challenged by changing times

By Kevin Brown

Time and technology are changing the way Americans buy dinner—and the way marketers sell food. Consumers with less time are looking for quick meals. Marketers are giving consumers what they want by introducing more lines of convenience foods, many made specifically for the microwave.

Families with two wage earners make up 42.1% of the population, according to Ithaca, N.Y.-based American Demographics. With more family members working, studies indicate that they lack time to cook and eat fewer meals at home.

Convenience foods often replace meals made from scratch at home, challenging marketers to package and sell traditional foods as convenience products with a quality image.

Soups in cans, envelopes and single-serving bowls for the microwave are marketed as whole-meal foods, rather than as meal supplements. Beef is precooked.

Pasta's popularity—in bulk, as salads and premixed with sauce—is skyrocketing.

More than 30% of all specialty pasta dishes are prepared in a microweve oven, according to David Fencl, publisher of Special Topics Reports, from Stamford, Conn.-based MRCA Information Services.

"Microwaves are the driving force behind 50% of pasta items introduced," says Tony Adams, director of marketing research and planning at Camden, N.J.-based Campbell Soup Co.

Microwave ovens, which cut food preparation time, are found in 55% to 72% of American households, according to industry sources. But only half of microwave owners say manufacturers have made enough food available for the microwave, according to a January Good Housekeeping study.

Among microwave owners, 48.3% say they wouldn't want to be without one, according to a

Successful packages turn medium into message

By Lori Kesler

Everybody does it from time to time—dashes into the supermarket for a loaf of bread or a jug of wine and walks out with several bags of groceries. This phenomenon, usually regarded as a nasty habit, could just as well be considered an efficient time-saving trick.

Consider that the shopper who sets out on a bread-buying mission may pack in food for a week, soap for a month and enough paper plates to last until 1989—all in the space of 30 minutes.

Package designers can take some credit for this phenomenon. After all, they turned the lowly product container into a sophisticated marketing tool. And by making packages that sell themselves right from the shelf, they helped revolutionize the way people shop, so that self-service became a way of life and the well-stocked supermarket a symbol of American prosperity.

But package designers these days are having to face up to problems born of their own success. As more well-dressed products hit the supermarket shelves, it's getting harder to stand out from the crowd.

According to a survey by the Washington-based Food Marketing Institute, the average supermaket currently stuffs some 17,459 items onto its shelves and grocery manufactureres are coming out with some 2,200 new products a year.

"With four times as many products on the market now as 20 years ago, the grocery store is a place of incredible choice," says John Lister, executive vp, Lister Butler, New York. "It's much more difficult to get yourself differentiated and noticed."

Indeed, the grocery aisle could well be the most competitive marketing environment in the world because consumers "are looking at every brand in a category at once," says Gerron Vartan, senior vp of S&O Consultants, San Francisco.

There's not much time for a brand to make a good impression. According to experts, the typical shopper rushes down the grocery aisle, scanning some 300 items a minute.

And just getting noticed doesn't count for much anymore. The designers say in this era of brand proliferation and market segmentation that every package must send just the right message to just the right people.

"In the past, virtually all grocery products aimed at the same mass market of women 18 to 49," says Michael Purvis, president of Sidjakov, Berman & Gomez, a San Francisco-based package design firm.

But now, he says, most products are created with smaller target groups in mind, so food categories are segmented by such things as price, diet and value-added benefits. Even such basic markets as frozen vegetables, beer and ice cream have become highly segmented. "All of this creates a significant challenge for package design," Mr. Purvis says.

Advertising Age asked several package design consultants what new trends are emerging to help grocery products survive in the supermarket jungle. They say customer convenience seems to be the driving force behind many of the industry's most recent innovations.

"We've come to recognize the customer's scarcest resource is time," says Mr. Vartan. "Any little thing that gives them a chance to buy back time is incredibly valuable, so convenience packaging becomes tremendously important."

In fact, the experts say, whole product categories have sprouted up around convenience—with packaging a key part of the character of the products. They cite examples like single-serving frozen entrees, juice drinks in aseptic packages and microwave popcorn.

Of course the microwave oven, which moved into the American kitchen less than a decade ago, has had a huge impact on packaging partly because it made single-serving meals much quicker to fix.

"The single-serving package isn't truly convenient unless it can be heated quickly. With the microwave, it begins to pay off," says Mr. Vartan. That's why foil-tray tv dinners had to move over for haute cuisine on microwaveable plates and then for microwave breakfasts, lunches, snacks and desserts.

The microwave is affecting grocery products in other ways, too. For example, virtually all frozen foods marketers now must take the microwave into consideration when developing carrier packs, deciding whether to use foil or cellophane and when writing cooking directions, Mr. Purvis says.

And new food products generally carry microwave cooking instructions even though the back panels of some so-called convenience packages end up looking "like technical manuals," says Mr. Lister.

The microwave influence, however, is just one part of the packaging revolution. Experts say package structures—the bottles, bags and boxes that hold grocery products—are getting a complete overhaul as marketers strive to build more convenience and style into them.

Marketers have long known a package with a distinctly original shape or style could help build brand image and communicate product positioning. But now they're also finding small structural improvements—such as easy-hold bottles, easy-open cans and reclosable tops—can make a big difference to consumers.

"We seem to be working more and more on the structure [of product containers] as part of every project," says Mr. Purvis. "Clients used to say, 'Here's the bottle. Design a label.' Now they want both structure and graphics."

Designers say squeezable plastic containers are turning up in more and more places throughout the grocery store. Ronald Peterson, managing partner of Peterson Blyth Associates, New York, points to Welch's Squeezable jellies and preserves as a packaging breakthrough, which helped that company squeeze into some new flavor categories.

The squeezable jelly bottle—designed so kids could handle it—was used to introduce a new line of Welch's Squeezable orange marmalade, apple-grape jelly, strawberry preserves and raspberry-apple preserves.

A spokesman for Welch Foods, Inc., Concord, Mass., says the squeezable container revitalized the spreads category, which had been flat for five years.

He says the stimulation for the move came from consumers who had been asking for a more convenient dispenser, "but it hadn't been possible until technology developed this kind of bottle."

Meanwhile, Quality Food Oils, New Milford, Conn., currently is rolling out its Sunola Italian Style vegetable oil in an 18-oz. squeeze bottle with flip cap and steady-pour spout. That container helps define how people will use the specialty product, says John DiGianni, president of New York-based Gianninoto Associates. "They'll keep this bottle near the stove for use in cooking," he says.

A few years ago, S&O Consultants was asked to create a new profile for the Wesson vegetable oil bottle because Wesson's traditional wasp-waist container had been copied by so many competitors. The company "wanted to change just to get a different image," says Mr. Vartan.

However, what came out of the project, he says, was a narrow-neck bottle with lift ring, a design that not only gave the brand its own distinctive shape, but also made it more convenient to handle because it doesn't drip and is easier to hold —an important consideration for cooking oil.

Even the old soap box has been redesigned in the name of convenience, says Mr. Lister, who notes the laundry detergent market moved fairly rapidly from traditional cardboard boxes to easy-carry bottles and finally to Liquid Tide's state-of-the-art plastic bottle with the built-in measuring cup and no-spill spout.

"Most packaging moves are evolutionary," says Mr. Lister, "but we all use grocery products so much that we get used to the changes very quickly."

Package designers say other new kinds of packaging structures also are gaining in popularity. For example, several coffee manufacturers have introduced "vacuum brick" foil one-lb. packs, which supposedly keep coffee fresher than cans. They sacrifice convenience for freshness, a price the consumer is willing to pay.

And dozens of companies now are putting fruit juices, wine, flavored drinks and milk into aseptic packaging—vacuum-packed airproof boxes designed for liquid storage. Aseptic packs, which do not require refrigeration, keep milk fresh up to three months and preserve juice up to a year.

However, designers admit consumer resistance sometimes limits the pace of progress. It's ironic, says Mr. Lister, that as products become more technologically advanced, they must look more homemade.

His company two years ago renamed and redesigned Nabisco's Easy Cheese, an all-natural pasteurized process cheese spread which is sold in a pressurized can. The product apparently looked too artificial to appeal to today's health-consious consumer.

"Nabisco had a good product and a clever idea. The challenge was to use graphics to overcome people's misconceptions," Mr. Lister says.

Aseptically-packaged milk, popular in Europe, hasn't yet caught on in this country. So Peterson Blyth Associates knew they were taking on a tough assignment when they agreed to redesign the label of Farm Best, a brand distributed by Dairymen Inc., Louisville, Ky.

"People don't expect to see milk outside the dairy case—certainly not sitting on the grocery shelf next to soup," says Mr. Peterson. "We knew the carton had to work on its own. It had to communicate the fact that this is real milk, fresh from the dairy, not a synthetic or a watered-down product."

The redesigned carton features the Farm Best logo framing a quiet country scene and a banner labeling the milk "freshly packed." a phrase that strikes a reponsive chord with consumers, Mr. Peterson says.

Meanwhile, Mr. Purvis says he has seen a dramatic improvement in the aesthetic quality of food package graphics in recent years, especially in categories such as fruit juices and superpremium ice creams.

"In juices, brands such as Minute Maid, Welch's Orchard and the new TreeSweet line have developed good graphics to communicate an upscale position and health appeal," he says. And he adds that superpremium ice creams such as Breyer's, Frusen Gladje and Haagen-Dazs are playing to the top of the market with classy style.

"We're also seeing greater sensitivity to color and more sophisticated graphics to differentiate products within lines and categories," Mr. Purvis says. "On the whole, marketers are paying more attention to how their packaging is developed," he says.

Super marketers pursue the new consumers

By Eileen B. Brill

For the supermarkets of yesteryear, the rules of the game were relatively simple: Give the housewife what she's looking for and she'll reward you with unswerving loyalty. But in today's market, not only are the rules no longer clear, but the basic assumptions about who the players are have changed.

Eileen B. Brill is a Fair Lawn, N.J.-based free-lance writer.

"There is not only more demographic segmentation, but also more diverse life styles, media preferences and purchase behavior," according to Peter Francese, president, American Demographics, Ithaca, N.Y.

A highly-segmented population means food manufacturers and retailers can no longer take the blanket approach to selling. In light of growing competition from gourmet shops and local restaurants, "niche marketing" has become the food industry's buzzword in the 1980s.

Mr. Francese points out that supermarkets must increasingly reflect the needs of local consumers. Their managers must respond more quickly to shifting trends and needs.

In terms of advertising, Tim Hammonds, senior vp at the Food Marketing Institute, Washington, says supermarkets will move from strict product advertising to service type ads giving consumers information on the best buys in season products, and perhaps cookng tips.

There will be cleaner ads, with fewer products—a move away from ads that are all type, simply listing products and prices, he says. "Instead, you will see more seasonal specials or good buys highlighted. There may also be more information in the ad, as a way to speak to the 'new' consumers."

One of the "new" consumers, who has recently been thrust to the forefront of marketers' plans, is the male shopper. Studies show he has taken on an increasingly important role in primary food shopping, rather than just doing fill-in trips.

"The Male Food Shopper: How Men are Changing Food Shopping in America," published in November 1985, men now account for about 40% of all food dollars. In contrast, a 1982 FMI study showed only 13% of all primary food shoppers to be male.

The Campbell's study, conducted by Lieberman Research and based on personal, in-home interviews with 787 men and 176 women, also showed that 77% of all men do major food shopping in a four-week period, compared with 98% of women; 83% of men do fill-in shopping during that period, compared with 86% of women.

Also, 37% of the men who do major food shopping said they are doing more shopping now than two or three years ago and will do more in the future.

While more than 70% of men and women choose a food store because of location, men are more likely to consider low prices and greater variety, the study found.

Men who do major food shopping and those who do not were found to be fairly similar in age, income, education and occupation.

However, their psychographic profiles were quite different. For example, 67% of men who do major food shopping see themselves as "considerate," while 53% of those who do not do major food shopping have the same opinion. Of those men who do major food shopping, 46% see themselves as "up-to-date," 55% as intelligent and 42% as successful. Of those men who do not do major food shopping, 35% see themselves as "up-to-date," 49% as intelligent and 37% as successful.

"Food shopping is one of the first major family chores that men choose to undertake," says Joseph Eastlack, Jr., group research manager for Camden, N.J.-based Campbell's, who notes that an increased interest in shopping has evidently led to a greater desire to cook as well. Although it may seem that cooking would lead to an interest in shopping, Mr. Eastlack says that men in fact become interested in cooking as a result of their shopping experiences.

The rising number of working women is by far the largst single contributing factor to the increase in male shoppers.

The study also found that: "Men who do major food shopping and men who do not do major food shopping prefer doing different types of chores in their households. Major food shoppers more than non-shoppers like to shop for food and prepare meals. By contrast, non-shoppers prefer to put out the garbage and watch the children."

Mr. Eastlack recommends that stores capitalize on this by demonstrating products during evenings, when men shop. He also says large blueprints at entrances showing the way the store is laid out would be helpful to less experienced shoppers.

The higher divorce rate, delayed marriages and more independent living arrangements have had some effect on the increase in male shoppers, but the rising number of working women is by far the largest single contributing factor, according to industry executives.

In fact, working women have become a niche. According to Progressive Grocer's 53rd Annual Report, released in April, there are significant differences in the buying habits of working and non-working women.

While shoppers without jobs list Saturday and Sunday as their least favorite shopping days, shoppers with fulltime jobs list Saturday as their first preference, followed by Friday and Sunday.

During the week, the impact has apparently been substantial;

However, the average tally for those with fulltime jobs is $57 per trip—the same as the average for all consumers.

According to a study by the Food Industry Management Program at the University of Southern California, as the working woman's income increases, national brand selection becomes more important. While 62% of all women surveyed gave "high importance" to national brands, 70% of those with an in-

Shoppers pick up more than groceries

Supermarkets are becoming more than a place to pick up milk and eggs. In some cities, consumers are leaving their local markets with free grooming tips, a trip to Barbados or, with any luck, a new romance.

Mixing and matching is the emphasis of "singles nights." They include ice-breaking games such as finding half of a famous couple while posing as the other half, completing a typical "pickup" line or confessing to "things I've never done in my lifetime."

Free samples of products, provided by manufacturers or local businesses, usually are sprinkled throughout the store. Some stores have customers rate the products to promote interaction.

Price Chopper, a 58-store chain based in Schenectady, N.Y., was among the first in the nation to hold a singles night. In November, 1985, more than 1,500 customers crowded its New Loudon, N.Y. store. Approximately six singles nights have been held since.

According to Joanne Gage, manager-consumer and public affairs for Price Chopper, the idea came out of a casual lunch conversation she had with a psychotherapist-corporate consultant.

He pointed to one common complaint from singles he knew: There's no place to meet "nice" people. Price Chopper decided to pick up the gauntlet.

"When we had our first singles night, we thought it was a nutty idea," Ms. Gage says. "Now it makes a lot of sense. The supermarket is a place where people feel comfortable. They know what to expect when they walk in; they don't have to dress a certain way, and it's well-lit and safe."

Police had to barricade the parking lot because traffic backed up onto the highway. People drove more than an hour to attend.

Participants range from 20-year-olds to seniors, says Ms. Gage, who notes that the day the event is held has had little bearing on the size of the crowd.

Boston-based Purity Supreme also has begun singles nights on a regular basis, after a turnout of 2,000 at its first attempt, June 11.

"The response was so dramatic at the Woburn store that we tried it again the next week," says Michael J. Mahoney, public affairs director for Purity Supreme.

Police had to barricade the parking lot because traffic backed up onto the highway. People drove more than an hour to attend, he says.

The stores were inundated with media attention, from both the U.S. and England.

Advertising for the event was limited to bag stuffers, signs in the store's windows and commercials on a radio singles show.

The success has been repeated in seven other stores. "We almost have to try in all 63 stores," Mr. Mahoney says. "The five or six secretaries in operations are besieged by calls on a daily basis from interested customers."

Organizers won't say how the volume of visitors translates into dollars. The events are held primarily for promotional purposes.

"I'm sure we get a little 'kick' in our numbers that evening, but it's hard to say whether it shows in sales in the long run," Ms. Gage says. "Besides, that's not why we do it."

Says Mr. Mahoney: "All I can say is that we're bringing in an additional 2,000 people per night. We believe that once they see what we have to offer, they'll be back."

come of more than $50,000 perceived national brands as such.

USC also found working women are less likely to shop for specials and read grocery ads, and are more likely to substitute a product if their usual brand is out of stock. And Campbell focus groups found that major factors for working women affecting their food preparation and eating habits are limited time, fatigue, and discretionary income. They eat dinner out more frequently than nonworking women and likewise spend a greater portion of total food budget away from home.

Dual career couples have not only put increased emphasis on convenience foods, but also the convenience of the shopping experience. "The strongest force in the market today is one-stop shopping," says FMI's Mr. Hammonds. "Stores have been growing in size as time becomes a more scarce commodity."

Peter Leviten, associate editor of New York-based Supermarket Business, says "even though the size of stores is increasing substantially, with most of the new stores running 40,000 sq. ft. and up, retailers are marking stores more clearly and separating departments so the busy shopper can get in and out quickly." He points out that chains are introducing home delivery services and even issuing debit cards under the store's name that automatically deduct the purchase from the customer's bank account.

The increase in working couples also has had a ripple effect on the number of teens doing the family shopping. A 1985 New York-based Rand Youth Poll, a market research firm specializing in the youth field—indicated that more than half of all teens questioned shop "quite a bit" for food for their family; with 63% of all female respondents in this category, and an additional 30% reporting they shop "occasionally."

Only 7% said they shopped infrequently or not at all. In 1975, a similar study showed that only 49% of the young women shopped "quite a bit."

Total teen spending reached $49.8 billion in 1985, up from 39.1 billion in 1980, according to the Rand poll.

Almost half the teens say they have a great deal of freedom in selecting foods and brands, according to a joint study by New York-based Scholastic Magazines and Chicago-based Food Processing Magazine, published in January of this year. Price was the main concern of the majority (51.2%), followed by nutritional value (18.6%) and brand name (17.8%).

At the opposite end of the age spectrum, seniors differ most significantly from regular shoppers, says Jim Stevenson, director-Food Industry Management Program at USC.

"Seniors is the one group that didn't put low prices as their No. 1 concern in our survey," he says. "They want friendlier, more helpful employes. Security around the stores is important to them, as is the temperature of the stores. They are more critical of mechanical things, such as how the shopping cart should work."

The mature market is comprised of "avid information seekers," says Campbell's Mr. Eastlack who adds this group shows a substantial interest in food, nutrition and exercise.

He says the mature market is now being looked at as two separate groups: those age 55 to 64 and those 65 and older. "The 55-to-64-year-old consumer especially takes fewer meals at home than does her younger counterparts," he says. "Those 65 and older tend to move back to meals at home."

Mr. Eastlack says that because both groups are looking for nutrition, convenience and appetite appeal, products should be positioned accordingly. "Advertising should present and address the mature consumer as she wishes to see herself—experienced, wise and appearing youthful, trim and energetic," he adds. Mr. Stevenson says seniors offer a tremendous opportunity for retailers. "Their special concerns mean that supermarkets can merchandise with them specifically in mind."

That approach has paid off many times over for stores servicing the Hispanic market, which, according to estimates, will surpass blacks by 1990 as the nation's largest ethnic group. According to several experts, Hispanics have unique food shopping needs: They tend to shop as a family, they eat out less often than Anglo families, they are very brand-conscious and they are major consumers of fresh fruits and vegetables.

Some stores have tried to meet the market's needs by instituting bilingual signs and having one person in each department who speaks Spanish.

FMI's Mr. Hammonds says the Fiesta Mart store in Houston, targeted primarily to Hispanics, has carousel rides, hot air balloons and pinatas to lend a festive family atmosphere.

"The supermarket is a true mirror of life styles," he says. "It is one of the few places that sees every family in America at least once a week."

Upbeat beef spots battle red meat's foul image

By S.L. Berry

Beethoven and beef don't have much in common, except a consonant and a couple of vowels. Or perhaps it's more accurate to say they didn't have much in common until Ketchum Communications, San Francisco, introduced its "Good News" campaign earlier this year, using a beef-with-a-beat motif for its television spots. The strains of Beethoven's 9th Symphony accompany one such spot, underscored as are all the ads with the slogan, "Beef. Good News for People Who Eat."

Upbeat tv commercials are only one of many promotional devices the beef industry is using to create a new image for its products. Other marketing strategies include two point-of-purchase programs and a print media campaign. Formerly a staple in American kitchens, beef has fallen from favor mostly because of growing concern about red meat's place in a healthy diet.

That old political saw about a chicken in every pot is no joke to beef producers. While more than $21 billion was spent on beef in grocery stores last year, that figure was down nearly 1% from 1984. During that same period, poultry sales held steady at roughly $7 billion.

For the first time in history, according to the Commerce Department, chicken consumption equals that of beef. Predictions for 1986 have the average person eating 70 lbs. of each this year—not including lamb, pork or veal.

"Price and nutritional image are in chicken's favor these days," says Bill Roenigk, director of economic research and membership services for the National Broiler Council, Washington. "The beef people used to have the attitude that chicken's gains in the marketplace were only temporary, but now they've begun to see that's not so. What we have is a scramble to see who gets what percentage of consumers' bellies." Mr. Roenigk says.

Although faced with increased competition from poultry producers, the beef industry hasn't chickened out. To counter chicken's reputation as a low-fat, high-nutrition food, the National Live Stock and Meat Board and the Beef Industry Council—a member of the NLSMB—have launched a vigorous campaign to educate consumers about the benefits of red meat, especially beef. Although the NLSMB represents the beef, pork, veal and lamb industries, the emphasis of the campaigns has been on beef.

"We want to promote beef as light, lean and convenient," says Tom McDermott, vp-communications for the NLSMB. "We want to show how it fits into today's life style."

To do that the "Good News" theme carries over from tv into magazines with ads in national publications like Bon Appetit, Glamour and Newsweek, all handled by Ketchum.

But beef producers aren't putting all their eggs in one promotional basket. Rather than relying too heavily on media advertising, NLSMB launched two new point-of-purchase efforts during the past year.

The first, Meat Nutri-Facts, is a program aimed at informing the consumer about specific cuts of meat, explains Mr. McDermott. It consists of meat counter

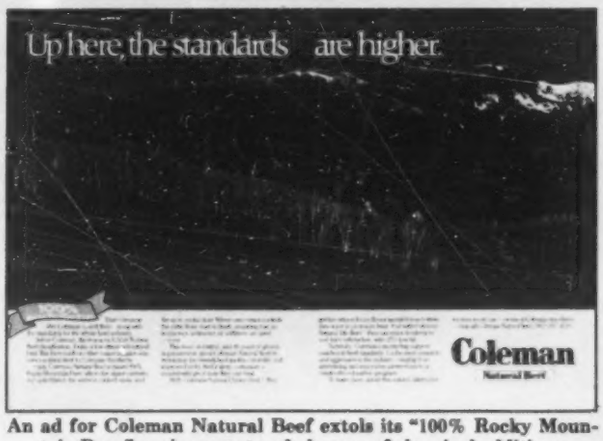
Colorado rancher corrals 'natural' beef market

In response to increased consumer awareness of the potential health risks posed by chemicals such ashormones, antibiotics, growth promoters, additives and preservatives in meat products, a few beef producers have turned away from modern chemical agriculture and back to a less synthetic past.

According to Mel Coleman, a Colorado rancher who heads Denver-based Coleman Natural Beef, the largest producer of natural beef in the U.S., there's a bright future ahead for his end of the beef industry.

Naturally grown beef, once found only in health food stores, is now finding its way into such national grocery chains as Grand Union on the East Coast and Red Star in the South, Mr. Coleman says.

He labels his products, Coleman Natural Beef and Coleman Natural Light. Both are chemical-free and minimally processed—factors that Mr. Coleman says more consumers are looking for in food.



An ad for Coleman Natural Beef extols its "100% Rocky Mountain Pure" environment and absence of chemical additives.

"We're hoping what we're doing will set a new standard for the beef industry," says Mr. Coleman. During a recent 10-day product demonstration tour in stores in Boston and New York, he reports having talked to more than 4,000 people about natural beef. "The concern about chemicals in beef is there. As we tell more people where they can get natural beef, I think we're going to see increased demand."

Toward that end, Mr. Coleman says his company has been concentrating its advertising efforts on retailers, offering new stores a 10% first purchase discount for stocking Coleman beef and promoting it locally. Ads in trade magazines such as Progressive Grocer have been directed at educating retailers.

The result, says Mr. Coleman, has been a growing demand for natural beef, which although it costs about 30% more than processed beef, currently accounts for approximately $15 million to $16 million of $50 billion in beef sales worldwide.

He says the chicken industry, which has been steadily eroding beef's market share for 15 years, will be less of a threat to natural beef producers once consumers learn the value of meat from chemical-free, free-roaming cattle rather than from confined, chemically raised chickens.

For one thing it tastes better, says Mr. Coleman. "And I personally think beef is a much better high-protein meat to eat."

display cards listing caloric, fat and cholesterol information. "We're giving more information about beef than anybody else is on other products where content information is mandatory," Mr. McDermott says.

The program has been so successful that the American Dietetics Assn. recently awarded the NLSMB, the American Meat Institute and the Food Marketing Institute its "Presidents' Circle Nutrition Education Award" for excellence in providing nutrition education to the public through Meat Nutri-Facts.

And the public, says Mr. McDermott, has responded enthusiastically. "When we pilot-tested the program, we asked consumers for feedback. Although only a fairly low percentage of them said they took the time to study all the nutritional information we're providing, 98% of them said they wanted that information to be available in stores."

As for retailers, he says, the fact that they've helped create Nutri-Facts signs and installed them, as well as coordinating Nutri-Facts recipes with weekly meat specials, indicates just how pleased they are with the program. Along with meat packers and processors, retailers have participated actively in Nutri-Facts workshops sponsored by the NLSMB, and have promoted the program through tie-ins with their local advertising efforts.

So popular has that program been with both retailers and consumers that the poultry producers intend to introduce a similar program, according to Mr. Roenigk. Called Poultry Nutri-Facts, it will be in stores next year.

While the Meat Nutri-Facts programs are in use in about 20,000 grocery stores around the country, the beef industry's second point-of-purchase effort has been limited to ten test sites in each of three market areas: Philadelphia, New York-New Jersey and Houston. Known as Meat Features—but dubbed Moo-TV by some—this program uses videos to stimulate consumer interest in specific cuts of meat.

The video displays have proven to be immensely successful among shoppers, says Tom Flaherty, coordinator of retail programs for the NLSMB. A videocassette recorder and a monitor sit atop the meat counter, with a recipe card holder attached, he says. The videotape tells shoppers about preparing a cut of meat displayed in the counter below.

"I really see this concept as the future of product marketing," says Mr. Flaherty. "It's also a great way to introduce new products. Not only will people see the products, but they'll be educated about them and they'll learn how to prepare them."

Test runs indicate that stores with the video units in place increased the sales of the featured beef cuts anywhere from 12% up to 25%.

Immediate plans, according to Mr. Flaherty, call for the NLSMB to develop a different video tape for every week of the year. "Eventually we'll have a whole library of tapes that retailers will be able to choose from."

The video tapes will cost retailers between $21 and $50, while point of purchase video equipment can run from $800 to $1,200, according to Mr. Flaherty. "If money is a problem, we hope to help retailers with the cost of using the Meat Features program," he says.

Whether buying new or using existing equipment, store owners have to make an investment to get involved in the Meat Features program.

"There's a lot of confusion among consumers about meat, so there's a real need for product education. That's why I think the videos will work, and that's why retailers are responding so well to the concept," Mr. McDermott says.

Both the media campaign and the p-o-p programs are part of the BIC's effort to re-establish dominance at the meat counter, an effort that last year cost the council more than $10 million for advertising and promotion expenditures combined. The exact figure for the 1986-87 fiscal year hasn't yet been determined. But industry sources estimate that a new check-off program—through which the BIC is paid for the sale of each head of beef, may generate more than $30 million next year—allowing the BIC to spend at least that much on advertising.

With that kind of money on the line, there's nothing more gratifying than free advertising.

And, in a recent promotion, the American Heart Assn. was kind enough to oblige the meat industry. Print ads promoting the AHA's early September 1986 Food Festival—an AHA nutritional education program—carried the headline, "How to live high on the hog and steer clear of fat," above a picture of a cow and a pig.

The ad copy streases that cutting down on saturated fat and cholesterol doesn't require cutting out all red meat consumption. Copy in the ad reads: "It simply means being more selective. Taking the time to find the leanest cuts of meat and asking your butcher to trim away as much fat as possible."

This was clearly a response to criticism voiced earlier this year by the NSLMB, that the AHA ads using photos of fish and chicken dishes to promote healthy diets smacked of an anti-red meat bias. While AHA officials insisted no such bias existed, they agreed the ads appeared to suggest it. Their reaction was the Food Festival promotion, something that Mr. McDermott says was really more than the NLSMB expected.

"The fact that the Heart Association people responded to our concerns in such a positive manner is gratifying," he says. "Giving consumers information that allows them to make educated decisions about what they eat is what we've been trying to do with our programs."

How healthy is red meat? If selected cuts are eaten in moderation it can be a nutritious part of a balanced diet, according to the AHA. The American Medical Assn. appears to agree: Currently it is studying a resolution that calls for recommending red meat as part of a well-rounded diet.

Even so, says Mr. Roenigk, the chicken industry is not squawking. When advertising expenditures for individual poultry producers, such as Tyson's, Holly Farms and Perdue, are tallied, "probably $100 million" is spent annually to promote an array of chicken products. "We're not wringing our hands, wondering when the meat people are going to knock us off our perch," he says confidently.

The beef industry almost waited too long before trying to stem the erosion of its market share, acknowledges Mr. McDermott. However, with more money now available for advertising, beef producers are beginning to shed their traditional attitude that their product speaks for itself, and they're getting more savvy about speaking out in its favor.

Kroger innovation aims at carnivore revolution

By Ed Fitch

Ponder the simplicity of Cro-Magnon shopping. Hungry? Reach out, spear a woolly mammoth, bring it home, slice it, dice it, roast it.

Not that the beef industry hasn't made strides—after all, refrigeration and mechanical meat slicers have since been introduced. But compared to other changes in food marketing, this segment still shows signs of the Neanderthal.

"The meat industry has lagged behind changes in life styles," says William Parker, vp-meat merchandising, The Kroger Co., Cincinnati. The erosion in the beef market, which had 1985 grocery store sales of $21 billion, down 1% from 1984, "came about because of a lack of innovation," he says.

Modern man demands convenience, even in a product as basic as meat. And although they haven't exactly re-invented the wheel, Kroger marketing executives have created an innovative concept in meat marketing —precooked products displayed in the fresh meat case.

"Consumer research told us there was a place for the product that would fit into today's life styles; that people had a strong interest in convenience," says Marvin Goldsmith, exec vp, general administrative manager, Campbell-Mithun, Chicago. The Campbell-Mithun-created ads stress convenience through a series of vignettes that feature young professionals' accoutrements like personal computers, phone answering machines and microwaves (AA, July 28).

Hungry? Reach out, grab a pork chop, pop it in the microwave, sit down and go to it. "We had to show how a primary property of the product was in tune with the target market's life style," he says.

"About two years ago we were looking at the trends of eating out and the growth in the number of two-income families," says Mr. Parker, "and wanted to come up with something that would address those shifts."

Some exacting criteria were established: The product had to be fresh, microwavable and taste as good as restaurant-quality cuts of meat, he says. "Research indicated people preferred to eat at home if they could get a high-quality, good-tasting product that was fast and convenient to prepare."

Although Kroger was putting out feelers among suppliers, "we weren't getting anywhere," Mr. Parker says.

Kroger has attempted to fit its precooked meat product to the life styles of people who demand convenience.

Then Kroger executives made a trip to Zeeland, Mich.-based Bil Mar Foods on an unrelated matter and discovered the company was cooking meat and shipping it to restaurants to be reheated and served. "We figured if it could work that way, it would meet our objectives."

The program started cooking when Kroger talked to other meat packers that were able to precook and vacuum-pack their products and round out the line to include ribs, pork chops, prime rib, chicken. "We had to market it as a concept," says Mr. Parker. "Some people had been doing this for specific products on a small scale, but we wanted to put all of the pieces together."

Everything came together last year when Atlanta-based Kroger stores first placed the product. Cincinnati and Columbus, O., were added as test markets shortly thereafter. "These were the markets that fit for product introduction in terms of the number of stores and share of market," says Mr. Goldsmith. Detroit stores joined the Completely Cooked program later, and last month Houston and Dallas were added to what soon will be a much larger list of markets.

"Sales have met our expectations," and the product should be in Kroger's more than 1,300 stores by spring 1987, he says.

The product's fast-paced introduction does not mean it has sidestepped all stumbling blocks. "The big drawback is cooked meat does not look good in a package—it doesn't look as good as red meat," Mr. Parker says.

The ad campaign was designed to circumvent the appearance problem, and in-store tastings and placement in the fresh meat case were instituted to overcome category confusion and consumer reluctance to accept the concept of microwaved meats.

Of those who sampled the product in-store, 80% said they would buy the product, Kroger research reported. Research also showed the mature market—an unexpected segment—has responded well to both the convenience aspect and smaller portion sizes, Mr. Parker says, despite its higher price.

Kroger is certain convenience will pull more members of the microwaving masses to the product line.

"We think we're converting new users to beef; people who weren't taking the time to prepare meat," he says. The company projects that the product eventually will account for 10% of total meat sales, an amount Mr. Parker compares to Kroger's ground beef sales.

Most important, Mr. Goldsmith says, is that the product will help to curb the decline in red beef sales. "This allowed us an opportunity to create some interest. The product is a real departure from anything that has been done in grocery marketing."

Regarding life in the food chain, Kroger is a firm believer in survival of the fittest. The microwave has become a tool for the company to skewer its competitors and become a mammoth player—not a woolly mammoth.

Turkey's holiday-only image plucked

By Julie Liesse Erickson

Turkey's not just for holidays any more.

Beatrice Meats uses newspaper inserts and print ads to promote its Swift Butterball frozen turkeys and turkey breasts as summer barbecue meats, while the Turkey Store makes fresh turkey meat as accessible as chicken and beef. And in a current tv ad for Louis Rich precooked turkey breast, a boy pulls a sandwich out of his lunch box. The voiceover says, "Remember how good a turkey sandwich tastes? Well, you don't have to wait for Thanksgiving any more."

These three companies have led the way in creating and marketing new products—including precooked cuts, lunchmeats, fresh turkey parts and frozen, breaded finger foods—that have made turkey an integral part of today's meat case.

In the 1960s, almost all turkey was sold whole, reflecting the meat's status as a special-event food.

In addition, 20 years ago 95% of U.S. turkey was eaten during the fourth quarter of the year, says Barbara Schuelke, consumer information manager for General Foods' Oscar Mayer and Louis Rich meat-processing divisions, Madison, Wis. Today, she and other industry executives place that figure at 40%.

The popularity of new products and the increased use of turkey for non-holiday meals have helped boost U.S. consumption from 2.38 billion lbs. in 1980 to 2.83 billion lbs. in 1985, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington. On the average, each American gobbled up 12.1 lbs. of turkey last year, as opposed to 10.5 lbs. in 1980.

Louis Rich is one of three companies that are trying to make eating turkey more than an just annual event.

And in California, often considered a bellwether state, per-capita turkey consumption is about 3 lbs. higher than the national average.

In the early 1980s, according to Progressive Grocer magazine, turkey overcame roast beef to become the No. 2-selling meat in the nation's deli cases, behind ham. But turkey's success poses a chicken-and-egg dilemma: Were new products developed because of turkey's popularity, or were they the catalyst for increased consumer interest?

"I think turkey has been successful largely because of consumers' interest in health, diet and a more active life style," Ms. Schuelke says. "And turkey is one of the lowest fat products around—even lower than chicken."

In addition, she says, the turkey industry received an unexpected boost from weight-reduction groups, some of which even went so far as to recommend not only turkey, but specific brands, in menus.

Tom McLaughlin, however, argues that consumers didn't become interested in turkey until the industry broadened its product line. Mr. McLaughlin is vp-marketing and sales for Jerome Foods, Barron, Wis., marketer of the Turkey Store brand of fresh turkey products.

Jerome started the Turkey Store line in 1983. "It really is a concept as opposed to a product or set of products," Mr. McLaughlin says. "It was a merchandising idea, based on the belief that Americans would eat more turkey if it were available in convenient forms. Turkey lagged behind the rest of the poultry industry because we didn't provide the forms people needed and wanted.

"Our strategy was a two-part one," he says. "First, offering the products people want—convenient, easy-to-prepare, wholesome products—and second, allowing the retail operator to increase his meat sales. Red meat consumption is down, and that means retailers have empty meat cases available. We've given them product to sell there."

In addition to providing all point-of-purchase materials to retailers, Jerome initially advertised the Turkey Store concept heavily.

Seven-media spending totaled $1.6 million in 1984. Since the products' debut, however, ad spending has slackened; 1985 spending, as measured by Leading National Advertisers, totaled $274,000. Carmichael-Lynch, Minneapolis, is Jerome's agency of record.

The Turkey Store line includes breast, thigh, wing and leg portions, currently distributed in grocery stores nationwide.

In addition, Jerome, the nation's largest grower of fresh turkeys, sells cold cuts through grocery store delicatessens, whole birds and various foodservice products.

Jerome does not release financial information. Mr. McLaughlin says company sales have increased 15% annually during the past three years. "The success of Turkey Store is proof in itself of the industry's success in

Finger foods are changing dinner customs

By Julie Franz

Contrary to popular belief, people aren't snacking more, they're just snacking differently.

People are eating snacks or finger food as daytime meals and giving appetizer parties, says Nancy Byal, food and nutrition editor at Better Homes & Gardens.

"Portable is popular," she says. "Finger food is the ultimate convenience food that can be eaten anywhere from the dinner table to Mount McKinley."

People also have begun serving the "no-dinner dinner," she says, offering a collection of finger foods and appetizers along with one or two selections for dessert.

That sort of menu is more casual for entertaining, easier to prepare than a seven-course dinner, and doesn't require a complicated setting of utensils, Ms. Byal adds.

According to MRCA, a Stamford, Ct.-based consumer research company, fresh cheese is out, yogurt is in. Granola bars are out and frozen juice bars are in.

Mexican and Oriental foods are really in, with frozen egg roll unit sales jumping 221% in one year.

Imperiled by the shift in American's taste buds is the venerable potato chip.

The nation's No. 1 snack food, selling at a $3.29 billion yearly pace, is being usurped by more sophisticated finger foods with an international flair including egg rolls, dimsum—Chinese finger food, tiny pizzas, nachos and fried cheese.

Finger food

Like most food trends, the finger food craze was first capitalized on in restaurants. General Mills reports that 39% of the customers at its Red Lobster Inns of America ordered appetizers in 1985, compared with only 18% in 1980.

And the 1980 introduction of McDonald's Corp.'s McNuggets created a whole new category of fresh and frozen boneless chicken products in the grocery store.

Despite a small drop in boneless chicken sales last year, marketers are still eager to enter the category, signaling their confidence of future growth in the industry.

Sales in the boneless chicken category fell 5% to $345 million for the 52 weeks ending July 18, according to SAMI/Burke, New York. Part of the category's drop can be attributed to a shortage of chicken caused by a surge in fast food restaurant sales of chicken products, industry sources say.

Most of the major chicken producers, including Frank Perdue, have entered the chicken nugget market. Earlier this year, Perdue expanded distribution of its oven-ready line of Perdue Done It! chicken nuggets. Campbell Soup Co. got into the act with two products from its Swanson frozen line, Swanson Plump & Juicy Chicken Dipsters with sauces and Swanson Chicken Duets, frozen stuffed nuggets the company says are aimed at "grazers."

ConAgra Frozen Food Co., Ballwin, Mo., this fall will debut a product that combines two trends: Chicken nuggets and mi-getting consumers to consider turkey for non-holiday use," he says.

Like Jerome Foods, Louis Rich, the No. 2 U.S. marketer of cold cuts, was one of the first companies to offer alternatives to whole turkeys. Ms. Schuelke considers the company's oven-roasted turkey breast, first prepared for foodservice use, a "landmark product."

The company soon expanded into processed turkey products. "We realized that turkey would be a successful cold cut because it took seasonings well and it was both convenient and healthful," she says.

Today, Louis Rich's turkey offerings include cold cuts, frankfurters and turkey hams in addition to fresh turkey parts and foodservice products. Sister company Oscar Mayer, the nation's leading marketer of cold cuts, also offers turkey within its prepackaged cold cut lines.

Although Louis Rich and agency Ted Bates & Co., New York, previously placed magazine ads almost exclusively in women's service books, Ms. Schuelke says the company's 1987 media plan includes health and fitness magazines such as Self, as well as regional and epicurean magazines.

In 1985, General Foods spent $14.5 million to advertise Louis Rich products, according to measured-media figures from Leading National Advertisers. That represented a 10% increase over the previous year's spending. Tv spots and print ads are themed "Turkey so right." By comparison, 1985 measured-media spending for Beatrice's Butterball turkeys totaled $4.2 million, according to LNA.

According to industry executives, promotional activity probably will help turkey to continue achieving steady growth. Mr. McLaughlin of Jerome Foods, which is in the middle of a study to update information on its customer base, believes that growth has come partly from younger, health-conscious consumers switching from red meats—particularly pork—and also from older Americans looking for poultry alternatives.

crowaves. The company will introduce a six-pack of all-breast meat nuggets in a single serving package that also contains sauce.

The product's light breading makes it microwavable, according to Scott Rahn, ConAgra Frozen Food's exec vp-general manager.

ConAgra may apply the same breading to its 10-item line of Hot Bites frozen chicken and cheese snacks to make them microwave, thus sparking another boom in the frozen snack category, Mr. Rahn predicts.

Micro-munchies

Increased microwave oven use has brought typical restaurant fare into the home by making it faster and easier to zap frozen, prepared munchies.

Microwaves also have made it possible for children to prepare their own snacks, like nachos or french fries, without parental supervision, according to Mr. Rahn.

According to Pillsbury Co., Minneapolis, one of the few food marketers with a full line of microwave-only frozen products, more than 52% of all households had a microwave oven in 1985, up from 43% of households the previous year.

The company's Jeno's subsidiary is a hot competitor in the frozen hors d'oeuvres category with its Microwave Pizza Rolls, bite-size pieces of dough filled with tomato sauce, cheese and other pizza fillings.

While sales in the frozen hors d'oeuvres category are down 7% to $97.1 million, according to SAMI/Burke, marketers are confident that the category will again boom.

Food Institute Report tags the frozen munchies market at $456 million, including hors d'oeuvres and frozen, prepared chicken.

Oriental & Mexican

Another segment showing opportunity for frozen snack makers comes from Oriental and Mexican cuisine, which both lend themselves particularly well to snacking and eating on the run, Ms. Byal says.

While egg rolls remain the primary Oriental finger food with sales of $46 million a year through grocery stores, an age-old form of Chinese snacking, dimsum, recently re-emerged.

Pillsbury is selling frozen dimsum under the Royal Dragon name through a joint-venture with Convenience Foods International Ltd. in Hong Kong. The line includes spring rolls, won ton and shaomai, all products the novice cook would be unwilling to try making from scratch.

The products are available in retail grocery stores in Dallas, Denver, Los Angeles, Memphis, Phoenix and San Francisco.

Along the line of Mexican snacks, ConAgra's Mr. Rahn predicts more snack products made from meats or even fruit paste wrapped in tortillas or other dough products.

Frozen vegetables

Geo. A. Hormel & Co. and Ore-Ida Foods lead the way in frozen vegetables. Hormel sells a variety of vegetables in its Gold 'n Lite line of frozen snacks introduced last March. The line is now very close to national distribution.

Ore-Ida has been testing its five-item line of breaded Vegetable Crisps in Kansas City, Oklahoma City and Wichita since January. The company is pushing the product as a side-dish alternative to regular vegetables. "Do you know what Ore-Ida has done to plain vegetables?" the Ore-Ida ad campaign asks.

Popcorn

Another segment that is booming because of microwaves is popcorn.

SAMI/Burke reports 60 million lbs. of microwave popcorn were sold last year compared with 17 million lbs. in 1983. Microwave popcorn accounts for 25% of the annual sales volume of unpopped popcorn, and 50% of total popcorn dollar sales.

Sales of microwave popcorn expanded 48% to $201 million in the 52 weeks ending July 18, according to SAMI/Burke. The biggest chunk of growth came from shelf-stable products introduced last year by Pillsbury, General Mills and Beatrice. Those now account for $136 million in sales, up 52.4% over last year.

While food manufacturers have been conservative in introducing foods specifically for microwaves, Ms. Byal sees that changing soon. "Before the year 2000, microwaves will be the major cooking appliance in the home," she predicts. If that's the case, frozen snack foods could see another sales boom.

If your target is people who own one of these...

Twinkies: 50 years of 'fun'

By Kari E. Super

Nutritionists may use Twinkies as an example of what not to eat, but that hasn't prevented Continental Baking Co., St. Louis, from selling 700 million a year.

These notoriously sweet little cream-filled sponge cakes have been a snack lover's staple for more than 50 years.

"Basically what this is, is sugar, fat and food additives. But in small quantities they're unlikely to be harmful," according to Marion Nestle, director of the Clinical Nutrition Education Center at the University of California, San Francisco, School of Medicine.

The actual ingredients, in descending order of quantity, include sugar, enriched flour, corn syrup, water, partially hydrogenated vegetable and/or animal shortening, eggs, skim milk, leavening, whey, starch, salt, mono- and diglycerides, sodium caseinate, polysorbate 60, lecithin, xanthan gum, natural and artificial flavors, artificial colors and sorbic acid.

"It's just a good, wholesome, fun food," says Harry Pierce, vp director-cake sales for Continental Baking Co., a division of Ralston Purina, St. Louis, "made from ingredients you'd find in your own kitchen."

In 1979, Twinkie consumption was used as a murder defense. Testimony in support of San Francisco city supervisor Dan White, accused of murdering Mayor George Moscone and city supervisor Harvey Milk, included a psychiatrist's statements suggesting that Mr. White's diet of Twinkies, potato chips and Coca-Cola led to the killings.

Segmentation heats up soup market

By Eileen Norris

It would be a marketer's dream: A product so hip it is a must at any party, so wholesome it is considered one of the best medicines for the common cold, so quick it is the right answer for today's on-the-go singles society.

Not only does such a dream food exist, but it is cheap and it comes in a can or an envelope. It is soup and, incredibly enough, it is facing some big marketing changes.

"The traditional view of soup is antiquated," says Dan Santangelo, vp-general manager for soup at Campbell Soup Co., Camden, N.J. "We aren't defining soup as the way to just round out a meal. We're looking at soup as a liquid food market, a way to eat today."

Eileen Norris is a Chicago-based writer and frequent contributor to Special Report.

It might seem unnecessary to change a product that seemingly is the perfect food, and one that reached $2 billion in sales last year. Lipton onion soup mix and sour cream has been a standard chip dip since radio host Arthur Godfrey read a letter over the air from a listener extolling the magical potion as a way to make any party a success.

Folk wisdom still proclaims chicken noodle soup to be the best home remedy for the common cold. The flavor rings up the highest sales for Lipton and Campbell. It's closely identified with "colds and Mom's Jewish penicillin," says Mr. Santangelo.

But make no mistake about it, soup is branching out. Marketers are no longer content to rely on nostalgia or its image as a filler to serve between salad and entree. Soup is hot and getting hotter.

The liquid nourishment is just the ticket for frazzled singles and working parents who get home from work only to stare blankly into the refrigerator and lose their appetite as they consider fixing dinner.

The big two soup producers are all but too happy to step in and answer the plea for help. The traditional canned soups share shelf space with dry and instant soups, single-serving soups and microwave soups. Most soup labels or envelopes contain recipe ideas to try to make the busy homemaker's life easier, and help ring up more sales.

Lipton and Campbell are spending big ad dollars to tout the notion that soup can be a meal in itself. They are enticing shoppers with variety, as evidenced by the new products steadily being rolled out and the dozens of new flavors being tested in small markets across the country.

"We're segmenting more," says Tony Franke, vp of the foods division for Englewood Cliffs, N.J.-based Thomas J. Lipton Co. "As in every other business, we're more conscious of single families and working women and every time we develop a new addition to the line, we measure it against this new set of criteria. What will work for the new life style? Years ago, that wouldn't have been the case."

Lipton is promoting the variety of its new flavors while attempting to identify segments within the soup market.

That sentiment is echoed by Campbell officials, who say they see themselves in the midst of a "soup revolution."

"There's less free time and shopping time is down about

Twinkie success story

pression, the testimony read. The press dubbed it the "Twinkie Defense."

Mr. Pierce won't discuss the "Twinkie Defense," or whether the U.S. health craze has hurt its sales. A spokesman for the company says the product's sales haven't faltered over the years.

In the past 56 years, approximately 40 billion Twinkies have been sold, making the product Continental's No. 1 seller followed by Hostess Cupcakes and Suzy Q's. Continental grossed $1.6 billion in sales in fiscal 1985. At 49 cents per two-pack, 80% of all Twinkies are purchased on impulse—51% by adults, Mr. Pierce says.

Continental plans to target adults with future advertising. The account is handled by Ted Bates Worldwide, New York.

A company spokesman declined to be specific about future advertising. Past advertising for adults has included a campaign called "Hug from Home," in which the company targeted mothers, urging them to purchase the product for their kids.

James Dewar mixed the first batch in 1930, hoping to activate the company's idle shortcake pans and sweeten a depressed nation for 5 cents a two-pack.

Except for a switch from banana to vanilla filling early in the product's life, Twinkies have remained virtually untouched.

Continental markets a devil's food version in selected markets during summer months. But that product hasn't really caught on, Mr. Pierce says.

Mr. Pierce says he doesn't think Mr. Dewar had just convenience in mind when he passed the first batch around the bakery. But he later recognized the virtues of a quick snack, and extended the product's shelf life.

"There's no muss, there's no fuss. You just pop them in your mouth," Mr. Pierce says.

Even Jim McMahon, quarterback for the Chicago Bears, was recently heard to say on a popular late-night tv program he liked Twinkies. Will Twinkies be the next Jim McMahon endorsement? Outrageous.

25%," says Mr. Santangelo. "Shoppers spend less than 20 minutes in the store. It's like they're on roller skates. We have to make a special effort to reach these people and tell them about how our cheddar cheese soup makes a great cheesecake and how our mushroom soup can be added to make a number of dishes."

That isn't all leader Campbell —which has a hefty 63% of the total soup market and saw its sales increase 7% last year, according to Mr. Santangelo—is doing.

The company added to its familiar line of 60 red-and-white condensed soup varieties by offering a line of dry soups, a category Lipton has dominated for years. Campbell executives estimate they hold about a 17% share of the dry soup market.

To date, Lipton's Mr. Franke says his company hasn't been hurt by Campbell's intrusion. "We have little competition in our instant, Cup-A-Soup line, and we are holding steady with about half of the market for the regular dry soup mix business.

"Since Campbell came into the dry soup business the regular soup business has grown by about 10%," he adds. That figure is close to the 8.71% increase recently cited by Progressive Grocer.

Recent Campbell ads appeal to the health- and diet-conscious and target the upscale with the "sophisticated" gold label line.

Instead of hurting Lipton's share of the dry soup market, which accounts for 25% of total soup consumption, Campbell's entry apparently did some good. Thanks to a new awareness factor, Mr. Franke says Lipton saw about a 10% increase in its overall soup dollar sales.

"They [Campbell] may have garnered a corner of the market, but as a result of their presence, it's helped all of us in the soup business," he says, adding that Lipton hasn't suffered any volume decline to date.

"The dry soup segment has become more important to Campbell," says Mr. Santangelo, "but it's not just that category. We want to be everywhere and because of that the company has made major investments in every key segment of the soup business."

While Campbell, which holds that "homemade" soup is its standard, is making an overt bid for the dry soup category, it hasn't ignored its liquid condensed soups, which will soon carry microwave directions on the back label.

Last January Campbell introduced the Home Cook-in' line, with flavors like chicken with broad egg noodles, vegetable, vegetable beef, split pea with ham, minestrone and lentil. Home Cookin' sales are expected to reach $75 million annually once the product is launched nationally, Mr. Santangelo says.

Gold Label Soups, which went national last fall, were modeled after restaurant-style cream soups. Gold Label is a higher quality product than traditional canned soups. In its first year, the Gold Label brand brought in $50 million.

Campbell also plans to have its Golden Classics on the store shelves soon. A non-creamy, upscale soup, in flavors such as chicken with wild rice, cheese pasta tortellini, and sirloin beef with mushrooms, the brand looks promising, Mr. Santangelo says.

And the company continues to test a "Microcup" single serving soup and another brand it calls

Test Marketing Needn't Be a Marathon Event If You Enter the Race with Early MarketCast™

Reaching the finish line of new product testing can be a long haul unless you accelerate your rollout decision with Early MarketCast.

As an overlay to test market programs, EMC provides repeat purchase data as early as six months into a test, compared to 12 to 18 months for typical test marketing activities. That's an important element in making "go/no-go" decisions and arriving at an optimum business plan for the product as expediently as possible.

However, Early MarketCast provides manufacturers with the additional benefits of large sample sizes, cost efficiency and flexibility as an enhancement to test marketing plans. Here's how:

LARGE SAMPLE SIZE: Building a meaningful base of consumers who have tried the product can take five months...or longer. EMC develops a large base of triers as soon as the product reaches test market. This procedure precludes the wait for a merely "adequate" base of triers drawn from on-going diary panel households.

COST EFFECTIVENESS: EMC is designed to minimize your test market investment. The elimination of six months of testing obviously will reflect on the bottom line of your product development budget. EMC also allows you to get into national distribution earlier in order to capitalize on the highest seasonal selling periods.

FLEXIBILITY: EMC can be executed in any market, overlaid on any test market design. The EMC procedure is not limited to a particular market, nor is it contingent on a specific research methodology.

If you are interested in streamlining your test marketing efforts for winning decisions, contact your nearest Test Marketing Group office.

Cookbook Classics, a premium soup in a sealed bowl that can be popped into the microwave. If that isn't enough, a frozen microwave Soup Du Jour is being tested on the West Coast. If successful, the line will carry eight flavors.

Concurrent with Campbell's entry into the dry soup arena, Lipton brought out its International Classics, a single-serving line of upscale creamy soups. Flavors include lobster bisque, New England clam chowder, cream of asparagus Parisienne, California cream of broccoli and cream of mushroom a la Reine.

Mr. Franke says the single serving line hasn't met expectations. But he rationalizes that the high price—two eight-oz. serving envelopes cost $1.49, whereas Lipton's regular soup costs $1 for two 32-ounce envelopes—and unusual flavors narrow the brand's market.

Officials at both soup companies say they are aggressively marketing to all segments and are not making a special bid for any particular ethnic group. "Some varieties may have ethnic origins, but soup crosses borders," says Mr. Franke. "Minestrone, for example, certainly isn't limited in its appeal to Italians. It long ago entered the mainstream."

Both companies say they are courting the Hispanic consumer, but not with any special varieties of soup. "Hispanics are a growing part of the population we want to reach," says Lipton's Mr. Franke. Campbell produces ads in Spanish in Puerto Rico, which are aired on Spanish tv in the U.S., Mr. Santangelo says.

Both Campbell and Lipton will continue to advertise on tv and in magazines, pushing essentially the same messages that have worked so well. Campbell, which spent $43 million in advertising during 1985, will stick with its tried and true "soup is good food and keeps getting better" slogan. Lipton, which spent an estimated $25 million last year, will stay with its "Nobody makes soup in a cup like Lipton" and "Nothing puts a smile on your face like Lipton."

Mr. Franke won't say what changes, if any, consumers should expect from Lipton in 1987, but he will say the company is setting goals and re-defining its marketing strategies. "Let's just say price-value relationships will be important, especially with our new competitive environment, and we'll continue to concentrate on variety, to cover the dry soup segment as throughly as we can," he says.

Campbell has no plans to give up its 5-year-old "Soup is good food" campaign. But Mr. Santangelo says the company will continue to improve and update its offerings. "Our strategy is and will continue to be to respond to our consumers. They asked for more vegetables in the vegetable soup and they got it. They asked for more Italian flavoring in the Minestrone and they got that. We just plan to keep pleasing," he says.

That kind of bubbly philosophy is what keeps soup boiling hot.

Growing yogurt culture warms sales

By Kim Carter

Manufacturers are feeding on consumers' yen for yogurt.

"The consumer is leading the way," says Jim Glicker, director of marketing for White Plains, N.Y.-based BSN-Gervais Danone, maker of Dannon yogurt. Consumers are the major factor driving today's growing yogurt market and subsequent advertising budgets, he says.

"We haven't seen dramatic effects on market growth because of new entries or big advertising budgets," Mr. Glicker says.

But advertising has increased right along with consumers' desire for a convenient, healthy food. That desire has helped yogurt become one of the biggest and fastest growing categories in the grocery store, accounting for 25% of a grocery store's gross dairy margin.

Yogurt sales reached $1 billion in 1985, up 15% from 1984, according to industry sources. Those sources predict the market will continue to grow 8% to 10% annually for the next decade.

In 1985, consumers ate an estimated 935 million pounds of yogurt, up 11.2% from 841 million pounds in 1984, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The more than 125 brands of yogurt nationwide represent a myriad of choices for consumers and a challenge for marketers fighting for market share and refrigerated shelf space.

"Ten years ago, you could walk into a grocery store and buy either a plain yogurt or one with fruit on the bottom in an 8-oz. container," Mr. Glicker says. Today, Dannon, the No. 1 yogurt marketer in tonnage and market share, sells 11 flavors and combinations of flavors in four-ounce four-packs, 6-oz. cups, 8-oz. cups, 16-oz. cups and 32-oz. containers.

The yogurt market has become so segmented because it is no longer a niche health food, Mr. Glicker says. "Yogurt is viewed as a mainstream food that fits well into today's fast-paced life style," he says.

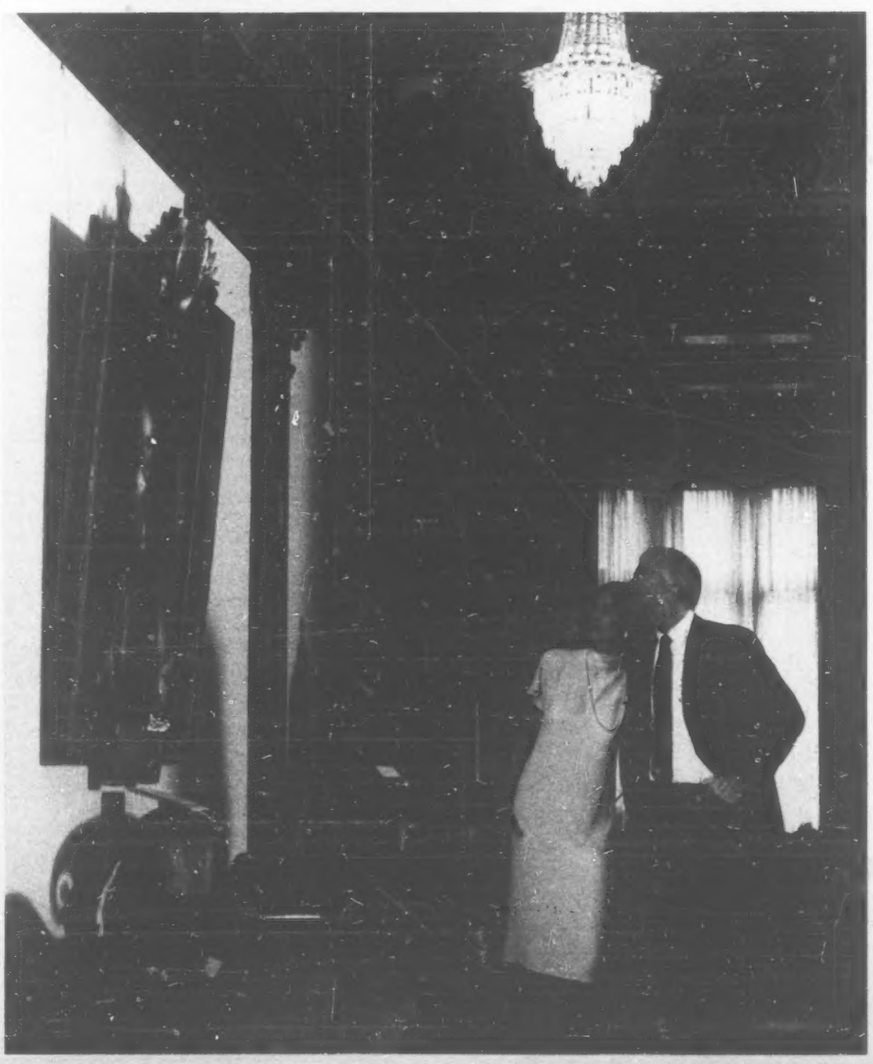
How To Influence The Affluents In The Twin Cities.



If you're in the market for a high quality major market, you'll find it in Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Because this area has an awesome number of upscale consumers in proportion to its population.

And the Minneapolis Star and Tribune reaches a high percentage of them daily:

In the ADI, 49% of the Managerial/Professionals. 53% of the college graduates. And 46% of the household incomes above $50,000.

A Twin Cities newspaper buy, anchored by the Star and Tribune, reaches these upper income readers at one of the most efficient CPMs in the country.

And it's getting even better. Because the Star and Tribune has the sixth largest circulation growth rate of the top U.S. daily newspapers.

If you'd like to know more about this lucrative market, we have a wealth of information for you. Just call Thomas J. Whelan, National Sales Manager, at 1-800-328-4674 or write: Minneapolis Star and Tribune, 425 Portland Avenue, Minneapolis, MN 55488.

ers became more caught up in careers, diet and faster life styles, yogurt's appeal as a nutritious snack has grown.

Yogurt is a good source of calcium and protein and may even have antibiotic and anti-cancer properties, according to Burton Kallman, director of science and technology at the National Nutritional Foods Assn. With that kind of report card, it would seem yogurt couldn't miss.

But 30% to 40% of Americans have never tasted yogurt, according to Dannon's Mr. Glicker.

Explaining that it's difficult for most advertising agencies to overcome the "spoiled milk" image of yogurt, John Hilbrich, account exec for Whitney Foods at Chicago-based Leo Burnett Co., says Dannon's ads have been most successful. With tv, Dannon has been able to entice consumers into desiring the yogurt experience, he says.

Most yogurt competitors are placing the bulk of their money into tv for this reason, Mr. Hilbrich says. "Television lets consumers see yogurt, feel yogurt and taste yogurt through the actor's experience, and this is important because in a recent study of foods that people hate, yogurt ranked third after lima beans and liver," he says.

Dannon introduced Dannon Supreme, Dannon Extra Smooth and Dannon Hearty Nuts & Raisins as a part of the company's plans "to continually segment the market because there is still room for innovation in this category," Mr. Glicker says.

The popularity of Yoplait yogurt's image has contributed to the product's reaching $1 billion in sales in 1985. This ad says, "Big ideas start with little cups."

Trying to penetrate Dannon's strong market position, Yoplait last month introduced YoCreme, a yogurt to be served as an elegant dessert. Described as "having the richness of pudding and the silky texture of a mousse," YoCreme is available in flavors new to the U.S. yogurt market, including cherries jubilee, strawberry romanoff, raspberries with cream, chocolate bavarian and amaretto almond.

Yoplait points to studies showing that despite consumers' concerns about fitness, they still want their just desserts. "YoCreme is certainly special enough to finish off the finest meal. But people also enjoy YoCreme as an anytime snack or a special treat at lunch," says Lisa Rubin, product manager for YoCreme.

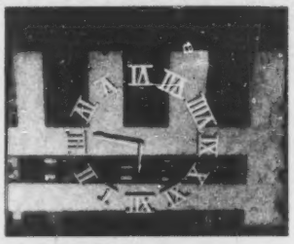
Yoplait may be right on target. An explosion of premium desserts is hitting the marketplace, according to Find/SVP, a New York-based marketing research company. Such desserts, including YoCreme, are expected to reach $1.5 billion in sales by 1990.

As Yoplait revels in its new venture into a premium yogurt product, executives at Kellogg's Whitney Foods are sitting back smiling, watching their competitors finally enter the segment Whitney took by storm when it entered the market in 1982. "Our desire was to produce the best-tasting yogurt in the United States," says Mike L. Wolfe, president of Whitney Foods, which after only four years in the market has a 4% market share.

Mr. Wolfe emphasizes that his company has only one yogurt product on the market—available in 15 flavors, including apples & raisin, coffee, wild berries and pina colada—marketed as a premium yogurt.

The Dannon 8-oz. cup sells for 55 cents, while Whitney's 6-oz. cup costs almost 77 cents, according to Mr. Glicker. But even with the size and price differences, Whitney's managed to capture and maintain a respectable piece of the market and, as Mr. Wolfe says, now it's time for Whitney's to expand into other segments.

Kraft has taken another approach to segmentation by touting two different yogurts: Breyers, a premium yogurt, and Light N' Lively, a yogurt for health and weight conscious consumers.



Dannon has sought to overcome the "spoiled milk image" of its product. Dannon held 26% of the market in 1986.

"The future growth of the yogurt market will be totally driven by consumers' needs," says Tom Herskovits, president of Kraft's dairy group. "We introduced the six-pack when we learned that consumers want convenience. It's easy to pick up the six-pack and take it home."

Kraft is also looking into diversifying its line of yogurt products, Mr. Herskovits says. But Kraft's plans will rest on whether or not the consumer wants a product that deviates from the lunch or snacking niche Breyers and Light N' Lively respectively fill. "If the consumer need is there, you can bet we'll come up with more products that she wants," he says.

the yogurt market has become, then yogurt's biggest teams are playing to win in every segment each is trying to capture. Total ad expenditures in 1985 were $43 million, up 46% from 1984, Burnett's Mr. Hilbrich says.

Dannon spent almost $11.7 million in seven measured media in 1985, up 105% from $5.7 million in 1984, according to Leading National Advertisers Class/Brand reports. General Mills spent almost $16 million in 1985 for Yoplait, up 17%; Kraft spent slightly more than $4 million in 1985 for Light N' Lively and Breyers, down 8% from 1984, and Kellogg's spent about $4 million in 1985 on Whitney's, up 176% from $1.4 million in 1984, according to LNA.

Part of the escalating frenzy in yogurt advertising is related to the fact that no longer is there a perfectly defined yogurt consumer. Ten years ago, yogurt was a nutritional staple for a health-concious woman who was always on a diet. Not so today.

Today, 60% of yogurt eaters are women, are between 18 and 49 years old and are college-educated professionals, according to Mr. Glicker, who adds that a new generation of children under 12 is eating yogurt as an alternative to sweets.

Most of the big yogurt players admitted they are targeting their campaigns to men, women and children in all walks of life.

The "Dannon is yogurt" tv campaign, handled by New York-based HCM, includes a businessman lunching, a father and child eating the convenient four-pack and a working woman running, Mr. Glicker says.

The present campaign is a far cry from the previous "Get a Dannon body.". Dannon has strayed slightly from health and fitness in its campaigns, Mr. Glicker explains, saying consumers are aware of yogurt's health benefits. "Now it's time to show consumers its other [benefits]."

"We have the largest ad budget in 1986," he says. "Yoplait's attempt to overtake us has fallen to hard times, so while they're decreasing their budget this year, we'll probably be up around $18 million."

Dannon uses newspaper advertising for couponing, radio in California and magazine, which accounts for 10% of the ad budget for each Dannon product, Mr. Glicker says.

Whitney's ad approach is less experiential than Dannon's. Whitney's uses only tv and true-to-life type characters who are crazy about the product, according to Mr. Hilbrich.

"Whitney's doesn't play up the convenience or health factors in its advertising because being a premium-priced dessert yogurt, these factors aren't major product benefits," he says.

Convenience and price are a major part of the advertising campaigns being run now for Kraft's Light N' Lively. The ads, handled by Geers Gross Advertising, New York, play up the convenience factor of the six-pack. Kraft also touts the nutritional aspects of the product by showing people that Light N' Lively has fewer calories than other fruit yogurts.

The message to consumers is that there is or will be a yogurt for every occasion. The clear message to marketers is that there is money yet t · be made selling yogurt.

Will plastic sack paper in checkout counter war?

By Kari E. Super

Jeanne Bakelar is telling supermarket managers that they can bag their use of plastic . . . bags, that is.

Ms. Bakelar and a couple thousand of her friends, all of them members of the General Federation of Womens Clubs, Washington, in June mounted a two-year national letter-writing campaign thanking supermarket managers for allowing their customers to take home groceries in paper sacks instead of plastic bags.

"Consumers have a choice and we have a voice," Ms. Bakelar says. "We tell them we like paper."

Check-out counters nationwide are the battleground of a silent war raging between plastic and paper bag manufacturers. Both sides are claiming victory, or, at least, not admitting defeat.

"Our major concern is what effect plastic bags have on the environment," says Ms. Bakelar, a resident of New Jersey. Plastic is not biodegradable, and that worries members of the federation.

"We feel that a lot of the stores are testing plastic," she says.

"They're finding out now you have to use two to three times the number of bags when you use plastic."

And plastic bags "flop" all over the place, resulting in damaged groceries, Ms. Bakelar adds.

Last year, one out of every four sacks leaving the checkout counter was made of plastic, accounting for about $132 million of an industry-wide annual $600 million sack market, estimates Ronald Schmieder, marketing manager for plastic grocery sacks at Mobile Chemical Co., Rochester, N.Y. and a member of the Plastic Grocery Sack Council of the Flexible Packaging Assn., Washington. This year, plastic accounts for 30% of the market, and one of every two sacks carrying groceries will be plastic by 1988, Mr. Schmieder projects.

This year, plastic accounts for 30% of the market, and one of every two sacks . . . will be plastic by 1988 . . . .

Proponents of plastic list its strength, reusability and economy of space when discussing plastic vs. paper.

Plastic sacks hold about 25 lbs. of groceries, or about 5 lbs. more than paper, without tearing, says Jeffery S. Siebenaller, the council's vice chairman and director of sales for American Hoechst Corp., Pasadena, Cal., a plastics manufacturer.

Unlike paper, plastic bags perform double duty for wet storage as garbage liners and protective plant covers, he adds.

And plastic adds stability to waste-disposal landfills, Mr. Siebenaller says. Plastic incineration is no more harmful to the atmosphere than burning grass, he says.

Indoors, plastic bags save supermarkets money in shipping and storage costs, and shoppers like their convenient carrying handles, Mr. Siebenaller says. Plastic bags are one-sixth the weight of paper bags and take one-sixth of the storage area.

A supermarket chain with at least 66 stores using from 2 million to 3.5 million bags per week can save from between $4,000 to $14,000 in that time period, or between $60 and $212 per store, Mr. Schmieder estimates.

But those cost figures aren't entirely correct, charges David Carleton, manager of the Kraft paper and packaging division of the American Paper Institute, New York.

"We try to get the stores to see the total costs," says Sam Posner, vp-retail packaging at Stone Container Corp., Chicago, and a paper institute member.

Purchasing costs don't include labor costs at the check-out counter, a big bagging expense, Mr. Carleton says. Because paper is packed more quickly than plastic and fewer bags are used, paper saves supermarkets 30% of the total cost of bagging at the checkout counter, he says. And paper retains its shape, allowing the bags to hold 20% more groceries than plastic, thus cutting down on the number used, he says.

Mr. Carleton points to studies that show the average single retailer can save $314 per week or $16,000 per year by using paper, not to mention that paper is biodegradable. Paper bags have their secondary uses, too. They double as bird cage liners, book covers and Halloween masks, Mr. Carleton says.

With plastic, "the issue is this —does one always pack out the plastic sack correctly?" Mr. Siebenaller says. On average, when filled properly "the amount of sacks required is the same as paper," he says.

Grocery checkers just haven't been trained on the proper way to pack a sack.

Meanwhile, paper bags still maintain 88% to 90% of the grocery sack market, according to the paper institute's figures. Few stores offer only plastic sacks and most offer both, accounting for some overlap in percentage figures. Mr. Posner admits, however, that plastic is sliding into the market.

"We haven't lost our core business, but we're losing the growth business," he says. He conservatively estimates plastic has 12% of the grocery sack market.

Rising paper prices, however, might change the packaging outlook next year. In 1985, paper prices increased costs, making each bag about 1 cent more expensive than an equivalent plastic sack, according to Mr. Posner. Paper prices may increase further, and 1987 will be the year plastic "has it's best run" on paper's share of the market, he adds.

"It's up to us to defend ourselves by promoting the paper bag. If we don't, the plastic industry will eat our lunch."

What's a shopper to do?

"Oftentimes what they [customers] do is ask for a paper sack inside the plastic," says Mary Ellen Gowin, director of consumer and public affairs for Wakefern Food Corp., Elizabeth, N.J., wholesaler for ShopRite, a 180-member grocery store cooperative operating in six northeastern states. "That doesn't save any money for the store," she laments. ShopRite retailers generally offer customers a choice between paper and plastic bags, Ms. Gowin says.

Customers who shop in stores in urban areas like plastic because the sacks are easy to tote on the cross-town bus, Ms. Gowin says. "But we find by and large that people prefer paper. Since paper holds more, it's less trips to the car."

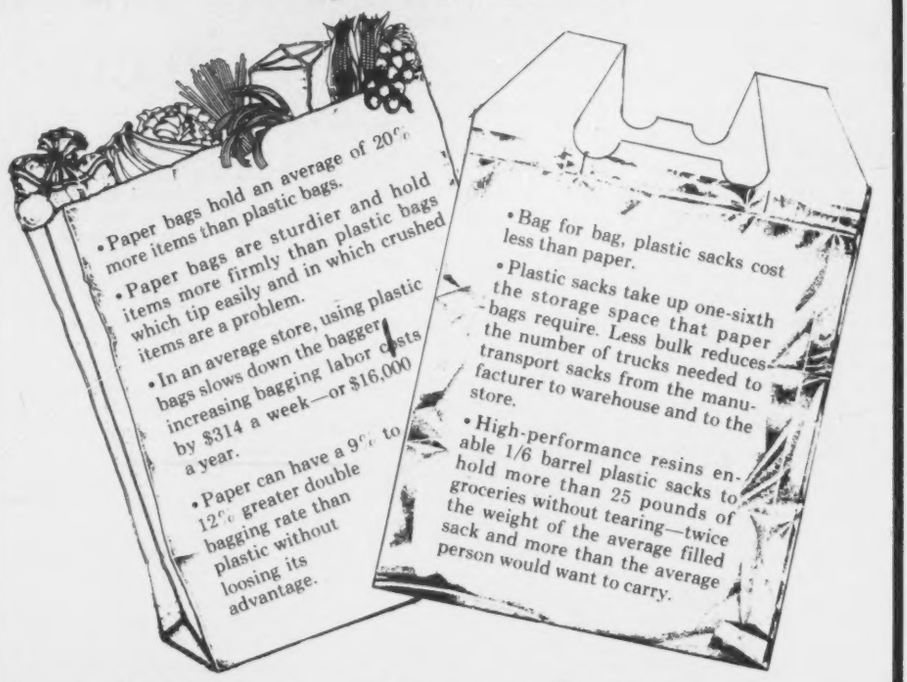
As far as Wakefern's future purchases of packaging goes, the company is "still determining" the costs and benefits of plastic vs. paper, she says.

The plastic council's Mr. Schmieder says there are no figures on how many stores are offering both plastic and paper. Mr. Carleton doesn't have those figures either, but he says supermarkets now realize that they need to offer both because there are customers who will demand and shop at the stores that offer paper.

"What you've got here is an evolutionary state [from paper to plastic]," Mr. Schmieder says. Because of customers who request paper, no store will ever offer only plastic, he says.

"It's hard to say what the real [consumer] preference is," Mr. Siebenaller says. "It's a mixed bag."

The grocery bag battle



• Paper bags hold an average of 20% more items than plastic bags.
• Paper bags are sturdier and hold items more firmly than plastic bags which tip easily and in which crushed items are a problem.
• In an average store, using plastic bags slows down the bagger, increasing bagging labor costs by $314 a week—or $16,000 a year.
• Paper can have a 9% to 12% greater double bagging rate than plastic without loosing its advantage.
• Bag for bag, plastic sacks cost less than paper.
• Plastic sacks take up one-sixth the storage space that paper bags require. Less bulk reduces the number of trucks needed to transport sacks from the manufacturer to warehouse and to the store.
• High-performance resins enable 1/6 barrel plastic sacks to hold more than 25 pounds of groceries without tearing—twice the weight of the average filled sack and more than the average person would want to carry.

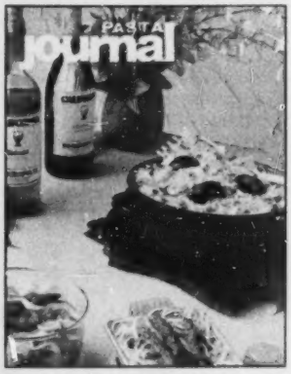
Pasta lovers add sauce to food marketers' sales

By Pat Gray Thomas

Say "pasta" and people smile. Anyone marketing this "ultimate comfort food" —it's good for dieting, depression or celebration-has good reason to be happy. Long identified with Italy though Marco



The National Pasta Assn., publisher of the Pasta Journal, says 1986 retail sales will better last year's increase.

Polo brought it back from China, pasta has become an American favorite. It continues to grow in popularity as the "food of the '80s," says Helen Sullivan, vp, and pr exec for the National Pasta Assn., at Henry J. Kaufman & Associates, Washington.

U.S. annual per capita consumption of about 12 lbs. of pasta in 1985 increased retail sales by 6.4% over 1984. Sales in 1986 are expected to surpass that figure, says Joe Lichtenberg, president, the National Pasta Assn., Arlington, Va.

Americans might approach the 65 lbs. per capita consumption in Italy, if FIND/SVP, the New York-based research company, is correct in estimating an increase in pasta volume to 3.3 billion lbs. and $1.6 billion (in manufacturers' dollars) in 1990, from the 2.6 billion lbs., $1.3 billion in 1985.

Retail sales for that old mainstay spaghetti, which commands more than 20% of the category, were down 2.1% according to Stamford, Conn.-based Progressive Grocer. However, it's the new pasta shapes, colors, sauces, entrees and salads that are creating excitement and alternatives for consumers and marketers.

America's heightened awareness of fitness and diet has led to a demand for convenient, nutritious, versatile foods. And nutrient-packed pasta in the 30 best-selling shapes of the approximately 100 made in the U.S.—NPA's pasta data reports 600 known shapes—is surfacing as a primary ingredient in today's fast and fit life styles. Consumer demand for convenience and awareness of complex carbohydrates are important factors for pasta marketers.

Major food companies are testing new lines of sauces (an annual $847 million business), dry pasta and various assortments of Italian dishes. Small family-owned, regionally popular pasta makers are selling out to major companies.

Italian dishes, always a primary ethnic menu in the U.S., have become major segments of most frozen entree lines. Frozen lasagna sales, for example, increased 66% in 1985 according to a Market Research Corp. of America, Stamford, Conn., study.

Because of growth throughout the $1.8 billion Italian cuisine market—1985 sales were up 9% over 1984—Pet Inc., St. Louis, is testing a 30-item line of exotic dry pastas, sauces, desserts and bread crumbs in April. Called Italian Market and packaged in glass jars and cans, all are "heat and eat" and many can be prepared in a microwave oven. In developing the line, Pet created more than 100 recipes that take 25 minutes or less in standard cooking procedure.

Italian Market is targeted to a sophisticated consumer interested in authentic Italian cuisine. Advertising, created by Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, New York, started in June in Wichita and Kansas City, Kan.

The print, tv, free- standing inserts and point-of- sale campaign will run at least six months, says James Matson, president of the Grocery Group.

A national rollout date has not been determined.

Other new pasta and related products from Lowell, Mass.-based Prince Co. are being tested in Albany, N.Y. and limited supermarkets in several major cities across the country.

Prince employes saw pasta becoming chic in restaurants and convinced president Joe Pellegrino that it was the time to introduce several of his favorite pasta recipes to the public. The President's Silver Award Pasta is positioned to battle the high-priced imports and appeal to "Any consumer interested in gourmet pasta to make at home," according to the tag line on print and tv ads starting in Albany in early October.

Prince also is marketing an All-Natural Pasta made with torula yeast, and Classico, shelf stable gourmet sauces, each deriving from a different Italian region.

Depending on consumer response to Silver Award's testing and rollout it could be the first national pasta brand. "It may go national," says Tina Freeman, director of marketing at Prince, "but not for the rollout."

(There is not a single national pasta brand available in the U.S.; Borden Inc.'s Creamettes, selling in 48 markets, comes closest to filling that spot.)

All food industry marketers are watching delicatessen-prepared pasta sales, particularly in Chicago, where the concept was born and continues to grow, says Tony Adams, director-marketing research and planning at Campbell Soup Co, Camden, N.J.

Unfortunately the "grab and go" segment is hard to measure, so numbers are not available, "but they are coming," he says.

From small regional dry pasta marketers and food industry conglomerates to designers such as Paul Harris with earrings in exotic pasta shapes and other pasta pictures splashed across his apparel, plain pasta has arrived in an array of inventive variations.

Skinner's Lone Star Pasta, from Hershey Pasta Group, is an exotic- shaped big seller.

Lone Star Pasta, part of the Texas sesquicentennial celebration, is an exotic big seller for Hershey Pasta Group's, Omaha-based Skinner Co.

The original product, in the shape of Texas, with "150" printed in color in the center, increased pasta volume growth in major Texas markets by 20%, says Mark Andersen, director of marketing for Skinner.

The shape and future of the pasta industry is heavily influenced by the three leading pasta marketers: Hershey with a 17% market share in 1985; Best Food's Mueller brand with 15.6%, and Borden with 15%. All are adding companies and products, further changing the business from small regional, family-owned operations to a corporate-run, lifestyle responsive industry.

Only half of the pasta market is seen in groceries, with the remainder accounted for in the food service industry and institutional facilities, according to the NPA.

An untapped part of the pasta market is the "... away-from-home segment," says David Fencl, MRCA's editor-special topics and reports.

Usually restaurants lead the home market by several years. However, while going out to eat is a part of the average weekly household routine—17% of all dinners and 23% of lunches are eaten out—"only 8% of pasta dishes are consumed outside the home," Mr. Fencl says.

Another undersold segment is the over-40 population. "They may be pasta-ed out," Mr. Fencl says. Pasta marketers need "a way to tap the growing number of kidless and one-person households," he says.

As pasta marketers increase company size and products, as segmentation expands and waiting markets are tapped, as pasta gains greater recognition for its health benefits, industry experts will continue to predict further growth.

"Real men may not eat quiche, but everyone loves pasta," says Hugh Symons, vp-research and technical services, American Frozen Food Institute, McLean, Va.

Changing times

Good Housekeeping study published in July. And of those who do not own a microwave, 45.5% say they plan to purchase one.

"More and more women are using [microwaves] to cook, as opposed to reheating and defrosting," says Carolyn Craig, associate manager of consumer research at Good Housekeeping, New York.

"We've also found that more and more men are willing to use the microwave than the conventional oven."

According to a Good Housekeeping study of 200 women with at least one child at home, mothers are still the primary users of microwaves, accounting for 78.6% of usage time. Children use microwaves 13.1% of the time, followed by men who are responsible for 6.9% of microwave usage.

And 69.7% of the time, microwaves are used for reheating, according to Good Housekeeping, followed by cooking vegetables 10.3% of the time.

Although 77% of families eat dinner together "always" or "usually," they prepare less of that food at home, according to the Food Marketing Institute, Washington. When they bring prepared food home, they buy only 10% in the carry-out section of the supermarket. Of the remainder, they buy 43% in a fast food store and 38% in the carry-out section of a restaurant.

To compete with all the out-of-home meals and to satisfy the need for convenience products, Buena Park, Cal.-based Lucky Stores Co. will have nearly 100 departments in each store by the end of this year, including delis and bakeries, says Dick Fredericksen, vp director of marketing for Lucky Stores Southern Foods Division. Lucky also is increasing the size of its produce departments and moving them closer to the front of the store to increase sales.

The produce and refrigerated foods departments are the fastest growing sections of the supermarket, according to Jim Moran, director of public relations for Camden, N.J.-based Campbell Soup Co. "People like interesting foods like soup, salads and sauces," he says. Campbell is marketing products in all three categories in the refrigerated case of the supermarket. The appeal is freshness, Mr. Moran says.

Beef sales' decline—mainly a result of the buying habits of diet and health-conscious consumers—led Lucky's 233 stores to install European-style fresh fish counters, Mr. Fredericksen says.

Because shoppers are spending less time in the store, Lucky redecorated many of its stores to make them more pleasant and contemporary. "Time is much more precious," he says.

Stores have always been designed so traffic flow gets maximum exposure to the maximum number of products. "We try to merchandise every nook that we can without making the store look cluttered," Mr. Fredericksen says.

But supermarkets have to contend with more than just faster shoppers eating out more often: They have to find room for about 2,200 new products each year.

Lucky's buyers meet once a week to decide which new products to carry, Mr. Fredericksen says. As a result, the stores stop carrying some lines.

"There are probably more products that are introduced today than are good for the industry," he says. "We have to protect ourselves by making sure we discontinue products that have slowed."

Refrigerated shelf space may be the store area hardest hit by new products.

"In our newer stores, we have more refrigerated shelf space," Mr. Fredericksen says. "But older stores can be a problem."

Regardless of where they shop, however, consumers want easy access to convenient foods. And, as long as consumers want to buy them, new convenience foods will appear in stores weekly.

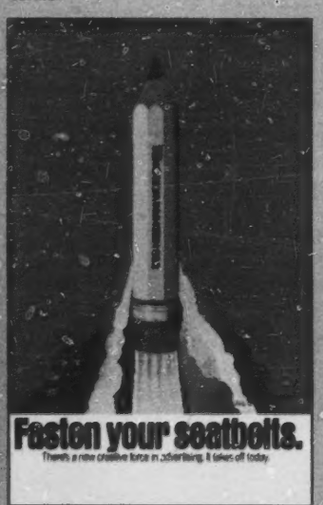
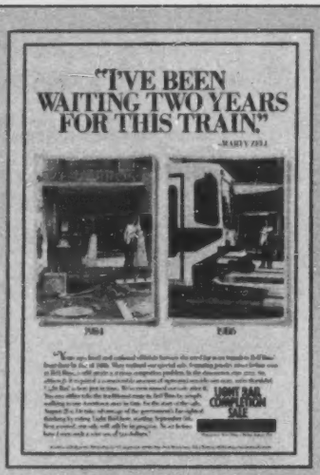
27. The proposed tax on Municipal Bonds.
We realize that the question of a tax on Municipal Bonds isn't high on everyone's list of priorities.
And that's precisely our fear.
Given the pressure on the House/Senate conferees to offset any concessions they make on tax rates, sales tax deductibility, IRAs, capital gains and other items, it's entirely possible that a bill will come out of committee with one kind of tax or another on tax-free Municipal Bonds.
Without a hearing.
Without time for reflection.
And without due consideration of the impossible price every town, city and community in America will pay for the tiny amount of federal revenue a bond tax would generate.
The simple truth is, without the low interest rates that tax exemption allows municipalities to run, the price of everything we have to build, from hospitals to highways, from sewers to schools, will skyrocket.
So call or write your two Senators. And your Representative. Tell them not to destroy a system that's worked so well for so long.
But please do it today because there's almost no time left.
It's not just a handful of Municipal Bond holders who'll pay for this mistake.
It's all of us.
LEBENTHAL

This ad for Lebenthal municipal bond brokers is a good example of a new genre of ads that uses the appearance of reader participation to make a point. No one is expected to fill in blanks 1 through 26, but the blanks draw the reader's attention to the 27th line, where the point is made. The ad was the first created by the new shop, Grace & Rothschild, New York. Art director: Roy Grace; copywriter: Diane Rothschild.



This ad uses color and a Milton Glaser original to officially launch DDB Needham Worldwide. Art director: Michele Farnum; copywriter: Perri Feuer; illustrator: Milton Glaser.



Zell Bros., a Portland, Ore.-based retailer, made "light" of a bad situation with this ad (l.) for a sale celebrating the completion of Portland's new downtown light rail line and the end to the upheaval caused by construction. The copy in the ad, via Borders, Perrin & Norrander, is hilarious. Creative director: Bill Borders; art director: Terry Schneider; copywriter: Dave Newman; photographer: Jim Piper.

Car makers pace ad gains

New York—Advertiser spending in newspapers in 15 major markets hit $231.4 million in July, up 14.3% over the same month in 1985, according to the Advertising Age Flash Report prepared by Media Records. Spending increased in 11 of 16 measured categories.

Spending by auto makers, dealers and dealer associations for new cars led in percentage gains, with a 28.8% jump to $17.7 million. The highest dollar volume gainer was department stores, up 13.7% to $62.6 million.

Other gainers included amusements, up 24.2% to $35.4 million; computer stores & supplies, up 8.1% to $3.9 million; food stores, up 14.7% to $30.1 million; radio-tv-phonographs-records, up 16.3% to $17.7 million; general merchandise stores, up 11.2% to $29.1 million; alcoholic beverages, up 19.5% to $2 million; publishing & media, up 15.1% to $7.4 million; airlines, up 11.8% to $9.4 million, and banks, up 15.9% to $5.7 million.

Among the categories posting losses were cameras, photo supplies and services, down 8.7% to $417,983; computers, equipment and services, down 22.7% to $1 million; public service utilities & communications, down 8.8% to $4 million; cigarets, off 27.2% to $3.3 million, and stock bond and investment houses, down 8.4% to $1.6 million.

The Flash Report is based on SAU inch measurements of 29 daily and 23 Sunday newspapers in 15 major markets.#

Produce

company gets from suppliers as far away as Chile to account for various growing seasons.

One added benefit is that the Green Giant line is already cleaned, trimmed and cut to save consumers time, according to "Best," Pillsbury's employe magazine.

Kraft Inc. is following suit with VegiSnax, a line of cut, packed vegetables it's testing in Bakersfield, Cal., and six other Behavior-Scan markets (AA, July 25, '85, et seq.).

The line, part of a joint venture with DNA Plant Technology Corp., Cinnaminson, N.J., has been scientifically perfected to produce crunchier carrots and celery without strings.

Spot tv broke in test markets Aug. 5, touting the line by saying that "ordinary veggies are ordinary. But new VegiSnax are specially bred. So sweet, so crunchy, they're the snackiest." DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, recently dismissed as a Kraft agency, handled the ads; the brand is now unassigned.

Kraft's VegiSnax hit America where it snacks by answering consumers' demand for more healthy finger foods, said Nancy Byal, food and nutrition editor at Better Homes & Gardens. Branded produce holds the promise of delivering quality, which is "an extremely important criterion for consumers," she said.

Look for produce departments to become even more service and value oriented, offering fresh salad bars and prepackaged fresh fruit and vegetable salad selections, Ms. Byal added.

Fresher, more consistantly high-quality products also mean higher produce prices, said Kirk Leighton, Campbell's group general manager-fresh foods. Consumers already have proven they will pay for higher quality by purchasing nonbranded products shipped in from foreign countries during the off-growing-season in the U.S., he said.

Campbell Soup has been in the fresh-produce business with its Farm Fresh label for six years, with button mushrooms, but plans to significantly expand the business, company insiders said. The company is aiming at a 15%-to-20% share of the branded-produce market, the source stated.

Campbell is experimenting with fresh tomatoes, spinach, green peppers and hydroponic lettuce and plans to introduce branded avocados, now testing in the West, nationally next year, the source said.

The company also is looking at expanding its mushroom line with more exotic varieties, such as shiitake and oyster mushrooms, to ride the coattails of the quickly expanding Oriental food category, Mr. Leighton said.

Campbell also is looking for foreign produce sources, including Chile, Israel and the Netherlands, to ensure that its vegetables will be of consistent quality, Mr. Leighton said. Almost 20% of the vegetables sold in America today are from offshore, he said.

Although Dole Food Co. recently eliminated its San Francisco marketing arm and placed that function with its regional presidents (AA, Aug. 25), the company remains a pioneer.

Al Vangelos, until recently president of Dole international diversified business and fresh marketing, and now president-ceo of Calavo Growers of California, Vernon, anticipates dramatic growth now that Campbell and Pillsbury have entered the category.

"You put that kind of muscle behind it and there's no telling what it could do," he noted, forecasting that branded produce may eventually account for 50% of all produce sales.

So far, most advertising has been geared to the trade, but the consumer "is the next step," Mr. Vangelos said. Branding provides opportunities to bring package-goods techniques to produce marketing, including nutritional information on labels, he predicted.

But the jury is still out on how effective advertising is in driving produce sales, Campbell's Mr. Leighton observed. Its mushroom products are backed by in-store promotions, print ads in trade magazines and some limited radio advertising. Marti, Flores, Prieto & Wachtel, San Juan, P.R., handles, in conjunction with CSC Advertising, Campbell's in-house agency.

Since "advertising has never been a traditional part of produce marketing, except to the trade, it will be interesting to see what type of advertising will be developed" with all the new competitors entering the market, Mr. Leighton said.

According to research, 25% of all stores now carry precut vegetables, said Mr. Vangelos, and nearly half of all retailers believe branding benefits them in terms of consumer perception of quality.

Dole is preparing to expand its test of precut vegetables (AA, Dec. 2), currently receiving tv support in Delaware. William Esty Co., New York, is the Dole agency.

Dole also has begun running coupon tie-ins with lettuce and related salad products, affixing discount coupons within the produce cellophane. So far, Anderson, Clayton & Co.'s Seven Seas salad dressing and General Mills' Bac-O-Bits have done tie-ins. A similar program with the Sacramento-based California Almond Growers Exchange's Blue Diamond almonds will test in four markets in November.

> Branded produce promises quality, "an extremely important criterion for consumers."

FAST FOODS ON GRILL

Entire category 'in play'; Mac plans nutrition ads

By SCOTT HUME
and PATRICIA WINTERS

The extended sales slump in the $45 billion fast-food industry has turned up the pressure, leading to rapid-fire ad campaign flip-flops, major product strategy shifts and frequent turnover in executive suites.

These strains have damaged almost all existing client-agency relationships, giving every fast-food account the appearance at least of "being in play."

McDonald's reportedly has demanded "breakthrough" ads from Leo Burnett USA. Burger King last year almost pulled its account from J. Walter Thompson USA, and now has a new top management. Kentucky Fried Chicken changed hands, with PepsiCo acquiring it for $840 million to give the soft-drink industry still more clout in the fast-food business. Pepsi's favorite agency is BBDO. Y&R just picked up its first business from Burger King parent Pillsbury, coming out of BBDO. And the stage is set for perhaps the greatest game of fast-food agency musical chairs ever. This in an industry that spent more than $1 billion last year in television

Agencies for top 10 fast-food chains

The restaurant industry's top 10 advertisers spent more than $850 million last year, and 1986 spending is expected to approach $1 billion, making restaurant accounts among the sought-after. Should any of the major chains open its account to competition, a round of agency "musical chairs" could follow. Source: Advertising Age.

Tribune may buy 'N.Y. Post'

By WILLIAM F. GLOEDE

NEW YORK—Newspaper publishing circles were buzzing last week with reports that the Tribune Co., parent of the struggling Daily News here, has offered to buy the assets of Rupert Murdoch's New York Post for an estimated $65 million to $85 million.

And in another deal indicative of Mr. Murdoch's continuing move out of newspapers into tv and magazines, he has apparently agreed to sell his News America Syndicate to Hearst Corp.'s King Features Syndicate.

The reports of the Tribune offer were roundly denied by top executives at the Post and the Daily News. Roger Wood, executive editor at the Post, said "the rumor has no basis," while Daily News president-

P&G weighs possibility of agency buy

By LAURIE FREEMAN

CINCINNATI—Procter & Gamble says it has considered acquiring an agency in order to take its $1.3 billion budget in-house.

P&G chairman-ceo John Smale last week told shareholders the company has "considered buying an ad agency from time to time." Mr. Smale would not say which agency or agencies were under consideration or whether P&G actively is seeking an acquisition at this time.

Also left open was the possibility that P&G could take in-house at least the media buying for its brands as RJR Nabisco, Anheuser-Busch and other major advertisers recently have done.

P&G already handles its network tv buying in-house.

Mr. Smale did say operating a full-service agency is not something the company is eager to do, telling shareholders he still believes P&G is better off using separate independent agencies to serve its numerous accounts.

"In Cincinnati we set the strategic direction. Writing copy is a creative undertaking and we feel better with specialists [handling that]." He said while some companies use in-house agencies, "very few stick with these agencies for very long because they find they don't get the same creativity they do with outside agencies."

Behind Mr. Smale's statement is the series of agency merger-related events that led P&G to reassign more than $150 million worth of billings so far this year. And for a company that is used to longevity and a top-dog role with its agencies, this kind of movement is dis-

Mikey comes back to Life

CHICAGO—Quaker Oats today breaks two new network tv spots for its Life cereal, featuring 18-year-old John Gilchrist, who played "Mikey" in a 1971 spot. Quaker has been challenging consumers to identify Mikey out of several dozen teen agers pictured on boxes of the cereal (AA, June 16). BBDO Worldwide created the new campaign, though the brand has been shifted to Jordan, Manning, Case, Taylor & McGrath, New York (AA, Aug. 21).

Birch and Nielsen negotiate 3
Birch Radio and A.C. Nielsen Co. are expected to conclude a "cooperation" agreement that would escalate the current war in the radio research business. The fighting until now has pitted Arbitron Ratings Co.'s radio research unit against Birch Radio.

Rivalry fuels air-fare war 4
The simmering rivalry between corporate raiders Carl Icahn and Frank Lorenzo is set to ignite again this winter in a bargain air-fare battle pitting Mr. Icahn's Trans World Airlines against Mr. Lorenzo's Texas Air empire.

Quaker ventures into frozen territory 24
Quaker Oats once again has surprised its competitors with a new product in the wholesome-snack market, testing a line of frozen-fruit ices under the Great Arctic Fruit Co. brand. Industry observers had expected Quaker to introduce a dried-fruit product.

Baltimore papers 'Post' challenge 34
Now that crosstown rival News-American has been buried, the Baltimore Sun newspapers are loading their slingshots to go after that Goliath to the south, the Washington Post. The Sun's tactics include more local coverage, direct mailings and special sections aimed at attracting readers and advertisers in the fast-growing and affluent suburbs.

Maxwell aims for U.S. expansion 66
Czech-born Robert Maxwell, who owns British Printing & Communication Corp. (the largest U.K. national newspaper group), 70% of Britain's cable tv system, St. Paul, Minn.-based trade journal publisher Webb Co. and two soccer teams, has his eye set on expanding U.S. holdings. "We're interested in the whole gamut—printing, publishing and communications," says Mr. Maxwell, hinting at other, soon-to-be-closed U.S. deals.

California agencies may take a different approach to work than those in other parts of the country, but the state's laid-back image doesn't apply to advertising. The state is crowded with agencies competing for too few accounts. A few are responsible for some much admired innovations.

Austrian, James exit Showtime

By VERNE GAY

NEW YORK—Two top executives of Showtime/The Movie Channel have resigned, signaling continued turmoil in parent Viacom Networks Group and an uncertain future for the ailing pay tv channel.

Neil Austrian, Showtime chairman-ceo and the former president-ceo of Doyle Dane Bernbach Group, said he would leave by the end of the year to pursue opportunities in advertising or investment banking.

Watson (Jay) James, senior vp-strategic planning, has also left the company. Mr. James was recruited by Mr. Austrian two years ago when he was a cable specialist in the media department at DDB.

Both resignations come just six weeks after Robert Pittman resigned as president-ceo of MTV Networks, another Viacom subsidiary.

No replacements for Messrs. James and Austrian were named and it was unclear whether Mr. James' position would

Beef, pork gird for meaty battle

By JANET MEYERS

Cybill Shepherd is moonlighting, too.

The sexy star of ABC-TV's "Moonlighting" series already is an ad spokeswoman for L'Oreal cosmetics, and the beef industry hopes to land her for a tv spot that will do for beef what co-star Bruce Willis has done for Seagram's Golden Wine Cooler.

The pork industry, locked in a battle against beef and chicken, bristles at the idea.

Ad stakes in the meat wars are big—$25 million for beef, up to $10 million for pork—and the new products they'll hype are being readied for market: Exotic pork stir-fry and new, branded, pricier cuts of beef and pork.

The National Pork Producers Council, Des Moines, last week signed Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt, Omaha, to handle its $5 million-to-$10 million account after spending only $2 million this past year with Fletcher/Mayo, Kansas City.

At the same time, the National Live Stock & Meat Board, Chicago, was close to signing Ms. Shepherd and James Garner as stars of its $25 million beef-boosting campaign, "Real food for real people," via Ketchum Advertising/San Francisco. Other stars considered for the campaign were rocker Tina Turner and Oscar winner Sally Field.

Beef producers hope the celebrities will add punch to their first full-scale network tv campaign, slated to break by Feb. 1, said Tom

Michael's 2nd coming heralded by new film album, fashions, toys

Michael Jackson, who's been next-to-invisible during the past year, seems to be enjoying something of a revival.

He's the star of "Captain EO," that 17-minute, $20 million 3-D space fantasy now playing at Eastman Kodak's pavilions at

Walt Disney Productions

Disneyland and Walt Disney World—a film that's said to cost more per minute than any other. It features two Jackson songs, was produced by George Lucas and directed by Francis Ford Coppola, with characters that seem to be a cross between those in "Star Wars" and those in "Aliens."

(NBC-TV aired a special marking the release of the heavily publicized short film just before the new season's "premiere week." Its Nielsen ratings showed a disappointing 10.3 rating and a 19 share, to rank 50th among 59 programs shown that week.)

Jackson's next record album is now expected around January from CBS Records' Epic label. The big question is whether the project, originally targeted for last summer, then this fall, will be strong enough to top the giant success of "Thriller." Still, as music veterans point out, one strong cut that could be released as a single would make the difference.

There also are Michael Jackson fashions and a line of plush animal dolls, Michael's Pets, inspired by the singer's own menagerie. View-Master Ideal Group, New York, will market the line in the U.S. and Canada "early next year," says Arnold Thaler, the toy maker's chairman.

So, in the future, we will not only hear the reclusive Jackson, but also see him, wear his fashions and play with his toys.

Writer cans the jokes, which now bring $6.95, applause thrown in free

As a speechwriter for Congressmen and corporations, Seattle's Jim Cook had grown to regard the blue pencil as his personal enemy: "I was always told to pull the jokes out."

Then one day while in the bathtub musing on his career, Cook decided that "rather than having to fight [editing] all the time, I'd put my humor in the can."

Hence, "Canned Speech." Cook filled pop-top cans with short speeches for every occasion: 40th birthday, nervous groom, the graduate, etc. Cook also offers an Executive Six-Pack that includes a keynote address, raise request and retirement speech.

"How does it feel to turn 40? Let's put it this way. As I look at myself in the mirror, I'm reminded of the great pianist Oscar Levant who once said: 'Beneath this flabby exterior lies an enormous lack of character.' "

In this vein, Cook's speeches go on to quote everyone from Miss Piggy to Bertrand Russell and, no doubt, Jim Cook himself. His keynote address, for instance, rings with frightening familiarity:

"Yes, these are difficult times. But together we must go forward. I know you'll understand what I mean when I say the future is now, the past is prologue, the bar is open. So let's get off our high horses and develop our game plan for leveling the playing field."

Available nationally through Spencer Gifts and the catalog Giggletree!, each speech retails for $6.95 and includes a boutonniere and an "Applause" sign. And that about sums it up. Any questions? No questions. Well, it's been a great pleasure being here. Thank you—and go knock 'em dead! ("Applause.")

Jim Cook's canned speeches come complete with jokes.

Watch your Manners before tying the knot

Miss Manners, whose syndicated columns tell us which fork to use and what's the right thing to wear at garden parties, is branching out into video.

The etiquette columnist, a.k.a. Judith Martin, recently launched the first in a planned series of videocassettes to teach the civilized approach to life. "Miss Manners on Weddings" unfolds against a backdrop of cucumber sandwiches and wedding cake.

Her hair swooped up in a bun (as is appropriate for married ladies of a certain age), Miss Manners spends 50 minutes counseling a set of rag-tag relatives, friends and bridal participants on the correct way to get through that most taxing of life's events: The wedding.

Some nuggets from Miss Manners' wealth of irony-tinged advice: Don't snigger about whether the bride should wear white. "The white dress," she counsels the couple who've just received their wedding invitation, "doesn't tell you about the condition of the body inside."

Kartes Video Communications, Indianapolis, owned by Scripps Howard (which also owns Miss Manners' syndicator, United Media), produced the $19.95 video.

C.B. Wismar, Kartes' executive producer, expects to distribute 20,000 to 30,000 copies of the video in book and video stores. After all, Wismar says, there are 3.5 million weddings a year, and "Miss Manners on Weddings" makes the perfect shower gift.

The video will be advertised in Bride and Modern Bride as "the ultimate wedding video from America's foremost authority on such things."

Wismar says child-rearing may be the subject of the next Miss Manners video. That seems likely because at the end of the first video, which uses actors from Washington's Arena Stage theater, Samantha Applegum and Dirk Dearborn have just married.

Miss Manners' new video, "On Weddings," is the (first and) last tape on marriage etiquette.

"There's talk of a miniseries," Martin says. "We could take them through to the funeral."

Ad pool is crowded, but the strokes are splashy

By Jennifer Pendleton

Describing the California advertising agency business as competitive is like describing Babe Ruth as an outfielder. Somehow, the word doesn't cut it.

No one knows exactly how many ad agencies there are in California, but almost everyone agrees there are too many for too few accounts. Pacific Bell Directories reports 5,500 listings under "advertising agency" in its California phone books.

The American Assn. of Advertising Agencies says that, including the local branches of New York and Chicago-based shops, it has 200 California members—65 in Los Angeles, 55 in San Francisco and the rest scattered mainly around Orange and San Diego counties.

The Four A's reports that its California members collectively had 1985 billings of $3.2 billion. Los Angeles-area agencies represent $2.1 billion of that total; San Francisco-area agencies, $1.1 billion.

New York sharpies transferred to agency branch offices in Los Angeles or San Francisco typically have the idea they will show the provincials how business is done. They find out that in order to survive they must scurry for $1 million and $2 million accounts just like the small shops. They find they too can be fired at the whim of an entrepreneur.

"I thought when I came out here I would find everything very laid-back," recalls Richard Kelly, a 3-year California resident who is trying to build Scali, McCabe, Sloves' fledgling Los Angeles office from scratch. "But I found that was not the case . . . Here, clients dispose of agencies frequently. And you've got to learn how to make money out of small accounts."

Ron Colnett, chairman of DFS Dorland's San Francisco office, laments the fragile nature of agency/client partnerships in the West. "There seems to be less interest in long-term relationships," he says.

"There are smaller, more mercurial clients. The marketplace is much more volatile."

But wait a minute. Isn't the market changing? With the growth of the California economy, particularly through the expansion of trade with Asia, the state is an emerging major market with sophisticated clients and cutting-edge creativity.

In part, this is true. A number of major accounts, particularly the Japanese automotive marketers, have emerged as major national advertisers based on the West Coast. And a thriving, creative group of advertising agencies has put California on the map nationally.

It was Los Angeles-based Chiat/Day that stunned the ad community with its breakthrough "1984" for Apple Computer. San Francisco-based Hal Riney & Partners continues to reap the highest accolades for its work for E&J Gallo's Bartles & Jaymes wine cooler. And Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, introduced all of us to the hip world of Levi Strauss' "501 Blues." With these triumphs and others, California agencies have gained a self-confidence that bodes well for the future.

Undeniably, the California agency business has grown dramatically in recent years. Advertising Age's ranking of the top 100 U.S. ad agencies in 1976 listed only two West Coast companies: Los Angeles-based Eisaman, Johns & Laws, with worldwide billings of $25.3 million, and Los Angeles-based Dailey & Associates at $24.8 million. But 10 years later, there are six: Chiat/Day; Admarketing; Dailey; Davis, Johnson, Mogul & Colombatto; Eisaman, Johns & Laws—all in Los Angeles—and Allen & Dorward, San Francisco (AA, March 27). (See chart on Page S-9.)

While the long-term future of the California agency business seems strong, economic expansion can't happen soon enough for the legions of agencies trying to prosper. At present, only eight West Coast-based marketers are large enough to merit a spot on Advertising Age's 100 Leading National Advertisers ranking (AA, Sept. 4). The largest, Toyota Motor Sales USA, ranks 45th.

And lately, it's been hard times for the agency business in California. The economy is soft, and there have been many changes stemming from mergers. Nearly $100 million in business recently left the San Francisco Bay area (AA, Aug. 18).

In addition, agencies have had to weather the severe economic downturn in the Silicon Valley. While only a few years ago high technology was the leading source of growth for San Francisco agencies, a national slump in personal computer sales brought the worst recession of high tech's rollercoaster 20-year history. Many agencies were left with whopping uncollectible accounts receivable; some went under. "There wasn't an agency around that didn't get burned," says Alan O. Pando, president, DDB Needham/West, Los Angeles.

But most observers see these as only temporary problems. "The advertising business has always gone through its highs and lows, but I don't see it as a long-term trend," says Laura Murphy, partner of Baeder/-Murphy, a Los Angeles-based executive-recruiting company specializing in marketing and advertising. Ms. Murphy maintains there is still a strong demand for seasoned talent and thinks that will continue.

And a thriving, creative group of agencies has put California on the map nationally.

Ted Burnett, president of Tracy-Locke, Los Angeles, believes the West Coast eventually will become the growth market as U.S. links to Asia increase. "Europe as a marketing area for American business is drying up," Mr. Burnett says. "The major economic growth will be Asian-based." He points to the billions of dollars in Japanese business now on the West Coast; "That didn't even exist 25 years ago," he says.

The Journal of Commerce reports that in 1982 U.S. trade with Pacific nations eclipsed U.S. trade with Europe. In 1984, it totaled $164 billion compared to $127 billion in European trade. Economists project continued and accelerating growth for years to come.

A few agencies already have taken steps to put themselves in line for the business. In 1983, the largest U.S. agency, Young & Rubicam, formed a third network with Japanese powerhouse agency Dentsu to create a new entity, DYR. Its Los Angeles office now represents an impressive list of Japanese clients marketing their products in the U.S., including House Foods, Nissin Foods, NGK spark plugs, Scripto Tokai, Sanyo Electric and U.S. Suzuki Motor Corp.'s motorcycle business.

"Our links to Japan are a major advantage in getting Japanese business. They open doors for us," says Bill Lyddan, director of client services at DYR, Los Angeles.

Almost every major agency in Los Angeles, San Diego and San Francisco hopes to be in a position to benefit from this expansion—and the trend hasn't escaped the attention of the large, multinational ad agencies.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA'S BEST MARKET IS ITS WORST KEPT SECRET

Orange County, Southern California's most affluent market with a median household income 29% higher than Los Angeles, is now a national advertising target. In 1985, its leading newspaper — The Orange County Register — carried more full-run daily advertising than any other newspaper...in the nation.

Ad pool is crowded

That's one of the main reasons those agencies, over the past 15 years, have been buying up California's independent agencies at a rapid clip.

In 1970, Ogilvy & Mather acquired Carson/Roberts, then Los Angeles' largest agency with $30 million in billings.

A few years later, BBDO bought Los Angeles' Hall Butler Blatherwick and N W Ayer bought Jorgensen Macdonald, Los Angeles.

Since 1980 there have been a host of other acquisitions: Interpublic Group of Cos. bought Los Angeles-based Dailey & Associates; Saatchi & Saatchi acquired Orange County's largest agency, Cochrane Chase, Livingston & Co., Newport Beach, Cal.; Cunningham & Walsh purchased Reiser, Williams, DeYong, an Irvine, Cal.-based agency specializing in high-tech accounts, and Dancer Fitzgerald Sample bought out Wilton, Coombs & Colnett, a successful San Francisco independent.

As the multinationals buy up the independents, the character of the market is changing. Today, national agencies handle the bulk of all area billings. "There is a tremendous misconception among advertising professionals that the west is a big gaggle of independent boutique shops. That's simply not the case anymore," Tracy-Locke's Mr. Burnett says.

But while fewer independent agencies remain, there are still a substantial number of entrepreneurs willing to take the risk of going into business for themselves.

Their attitude reflects what's traditionally been considered a California perspective: Optimism and commitment to forging their own destiny.

Ray Coen, a former BBDO/West executive, formed West Los Angeles-based Ray Coen Co. five years ago. "Clients and agencies tend to mirror each other," he explains.

"In California, there will always be a core of new, entrepreneurial companies willing to take a chance," he says. As head of his own agency, Mr. Coen adds that he is "entitled to make my own mistakes, live by my own decisions. And reap the rewards and penalties."

Most observers predict that more new agencies will form, particularly in light of the merger trend.

Professionals let go in the consolidations, or disillusioned by the changing nature of their agencies, may jump ship to form their own businesses.

Yet the landscape is littered with the remains of small shops that haven't made it. And it's a sure bet there will be other casualties as the competition intensifies.

A sure attention-getter for a small agency is excellent creative work.

San Francisco-based Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, an agency formed by former Ogilvy & Mather associates of Hal Riney, currently is on a roll.

Although the agency is small —with only around $20 million in billings—it has won the advertising industry's highest awards through daring work for the San Francisco Examiner and the Mill Valley Film Festival, among others.

Jeff Manning, senior vp for Ketchum Advertising, has been working in San Francisco for the past 13 years. During that time he's seen California's creative output become increasingly sophisticated.

"It used to be that we had to say 'We may not do as good work, but it sure is pretty out here.' That's not the case anymore. The look and feel of California's creative work has become very big time," he says.

So while he used to always advise fresh-from-college job aspirants to go to New York, now he tells them they can learn much of what they need to know on the West Coast. "[Going to New York] is not so mandatory anymore," he says.

Still, some, such as Los Angeles-based marketing consultant Marvin Corwin, insist the West Coast still has a long way to go when it comes to training agency personnel.

Because of the presence of Hollywood, Los Angeles has a thriving creative community, says Mr. Corwin. But he thinks the account side is a different story. With the absence of large package-goods companies as training ground, account executives often are ill-equipped for the challenges they face, he maintains.

"People out here don't know what an account executive is," Mr. Corwin says.

The combination of strong creative and weak account service means that sometimes West Coast agencies "feel the need to shoot from the hip," he says.

"They stop selling the product and get caught up in form without substance. Somtimes, I don't know if they're selling anything."

A lot of people have never heard of the Health & Tennis Corporation of America.

But a whole lot of people remember the advertising of the 300 different health clubs they own around the country. Holiday Spa Health Club in Southern California; Chicago Health Clubs in Chicago; President's Health Clubs in Dallas and Houston; Vic Tanny in Detroit; Jack LaLanne in New York, and many more.

Since 1976 J. Walter Thompson/West has had the enviable task of creating advertising for the Health & Tennis Corporation with America's strongest examples of fitness—some of its most popular TV and movie stars, culminating in 1985 with Cher.

We believe in physical fitness. But there's a lot to be said for fiscal fitness too. And we're delighted that our efforts have helped make the Health & Tennis Corporation of America the largest and most successful company of its kind in the world.

That's J. Walter Response. Interested? Call Jim Agnew at (213) 553-8383.

FAST FOODS

alone.

"There are some frayed nerves," said Charles Glovsky, analyst at Alex. Brown & Sons, Baltimore. "With sales as bad as they are, the chains have to be extremely sensitive and alert to what their competition is doing. They need to react immediately and simultaneously on several fronts, one of which is advertising. In this competitive environment, there are only going to be two types of companies: The quick and the dead."

McDonald's led the way last week, ending its NFL promotion and ushering up new creative for the McD.L.T. McDonald's had been dissatisfied with earlier McD.L.T. campaigns from Burnett and in June forced a change in the personnel handling its account (AA, June 23).

McDonald's isn't shopping its $250 million-plus account, but it is putting heavy pressure on Burnett to buttress McD.L.T. sales.

The new team was under orders to produce "breakthrough" McD.L.T. creative that would work better than the short-lived Romeo and Juliet and animated Pepe LePew spots aired during the Super Bowl.

The Burnett team delivered "Wheel of Fortune's" Vanna White and others in new executions for the McD.L.T.

The product-sell campaign shows shots of the McD.L.T. and its ingredients, as celebrities explain the McD.L.T. was misnamed. They say it's more than a burger with lettuce and tomato and should be called "The one with the works."

It remains to be seen if that set of ads will help the McD.L.T., which one source said has been "heavily media dependent," meaning that when advertising slows down for the sandwich, so do sales.

(BK is now firing back at McDonald's and is heavily advertising its burgers, particularly its basic product, the Whopper. "They were calling the McD.L.T. the 'Whopper Stopper,'" said Steve Bowen, exec vp-general manager, JWT/New York. "But it hasn't done it...we knew McDonald's would get a certain amount of trial no matter what, but once the hoopla died down, we knew we'd market against them...Everyone knows that to grow now, you have to take it out of each other's hide.")

McDonald's also has instructed Burnett to prepare a major print campaign to promote the nutritional qualities of its food, according to sources. That campaign could break as early as January. The chain, which annually has spent less than $1 million for print advertising, next year plans to spend upwards of $12 million on print, positioning itself as the fast-food industry's nutrition leader in such publications as People, where the McDonald's name has not been before. A company spokeswoman had no comment on the report.

Reportedly, Burnett faces an additional pressure in this new assignment: Get across the nutritional claims without drawing the ire of fast-food critics.

But Burnett is not the only fast-food agency feeling the heat:

• J. Walter Thompson USA earlier this year came close to losing its hold on the $200 million Burger King account, according to former BK president Jay Darling (AA, July 28), and that relationship still is believed to be tenuous.

There were reports last week that several agencies had been contacted about pitching the Burger King account, but BK denied the reports, suggesting that agencies may be trying to create the illusion that the account is shaky.

Also, Charles Olcott, region vp, BK Northeast region, became BK USA president, and C. Ronald Petty was named president, BK International from exec vp.

BK sales this year were running 4% to 8% below last year's levels, but the sales decline slowed in August with the reintroduction of its Chicken Tenders. Analysts say BK real sales are now at last year's levels.

• The fate of the Kentucky Fried Chicken account at Young & Rubicam, New York, is in question following PepsiCo's purchase of the chain. Y&R's handling of the Canada Dry and Dr Pepper accounts may be less of a problem than PepsiCo's interest in placing the $75 million account with one of its agencies, especially Omnicom's BBDO (recently relieved of all its assignments from BK parent Pillsbury). Omnicom affiliate Tracy-Locke, Dallas, already handles PepsiCo's Taco Bell chain.

The Pillsbury billings pulled from BBDO, however, went predominantly to Y&R, establishing a relationship with Burger King's parent company that could prove useful, to say the least, if KFC were to move.

Y&R did get a small vote of confidence earlier this month when KFC consolidated its $3.5 million Canadian account at Y&R in Toronto, giving it the English-speaking provinces previously handled by Foote, Cone & Belding, Toronto.

The wild card in the agency shuffle continues to be BBDO's Omnicom partner, DDB Needham Worldwide, which has taken on no serious fast-food business since 1981 when McDonald's dumped Needham, Harper & Steers, Chicago. Both Wendy's and Burger King are believed to be interested in Needham, but have had overtures rebuffed.

DDB Needham is one of only a few Chicago agencies large enough to handle McDonald's account (and Big Mac's local commitment ensures that it will keep the business near its suburban Oak Brook, Ill., headquarters), and chairman Keith Reinhard may still be hoping that Big Mac will return. But when Wendy's last week dropped Pepsi-Cola from its own stores in favor of Coca-Cola to protest Pepsi's growing presence in the fast-food business, it inadvertantly revealed how intertwined the fast-food and soft-drink industries have become: Would Coke's largest customer switch to an agency affiliated with Pepsi's primary shop?

Were KFC to switch to BBDO (seemingly removing DDB Needham from the arena) or if DDB Needham were to relent and take on Wendy's or BK, a flurry of agency swapping could ensue. "It would be 'change partners and dance,'" suggested an exec at one major fast-food chain.

KFC is looking at new products to increase lunch business and also healthier foods, including testing a nonfried chicken, salads, sandwiches and lowering the salt content in all products.

Emphasis at KFC will be placed on home delivery. PepsiCo president Michael Jordan, at an analysts meeting in New York last week, indicated that the computerized regional customer service centers already working for Pepsi's Pizza Hut chain could be easily expanded to incorporate its KFC as well. The centers take calls from an entire metropolitan area and pass the order along to the closest unit and keep a record of a customer's orders.

Significantly, Pizza Hut agency Chiat/Day has split the account with its Los Angeles office handling restaurant advertising, while its New York office will take over home-delivery ads.

• Wendy's chairman, Robert Barney, flatly denied any unhappiness with national agency DFS Dorland Worldwide, New York, despite persistent rumors that a serious rift exists and the fact that Wendy's this year also has used its sales-promotion and black-consumer agencies for national campaigns in place of DFS Dorland.

Mr. Barney explained the switch to Coca-Cola in a full-page "open letter" ad in the Oct. 16 Wall Street Journal—paid for by Coca-Cola. He said "PepsiCo's interests are in direct conflict with ours" and concluded "it's not good business to support a company that is trying to make our customers theirs."

The switch, to take place over the next 60 days, represents $1.6 billion in soft-drink retail sales at Wendy's over a five-year contract. For Coke, which claims 70% of all fountain sales, the agreement amounts to 20 million additional gallons of Coke syrup sold over the next five years. Fountain sales represent one-third of all Coke sales.

Pepsi, claiming fountain sales represent one-fifth of its total soft-drink sales, said the loss of Wendy's is minor, representing 2.5% of its fountain sales and 1% of total soft-drink sales.

Coca-Cola USA president Ed Mellett is credited with persuading Burger King to switch from Coke to Pepsi in June, 1983. Mr. Mellett was then president-Pepsi USA's foodservice division.

Wendy's, too, is considering some new tactics. In Milwaukee, the chain is testing the impact of dramatic price reductions and has added its first "small" hamburger to compete with McDonald's and Burger King's lowest-price burgers (AA, Oct. 13). If successful, that tactic and the new product rapidly could be expanded to other markets.#

A line of finger-snapping raisins is from one of several recent spots featuring manipulated clay figures.

Clay people invade world of advertising

Vinton shop goes 'low-tech'

By BRIAN LOWRY

What do Domino's Pizza, Nike, Kentucky Fried Chicken and Benjamin Franklin Savings have in common?

They've all discovered Claymation, a Gumby-like animation style featuring manipulated clay figures, the stock-in-trade of Will Vinton Productions, Portland, Ore.

Mr. Vinton, 38, won an Academy Award for one of his first short films, "Closed Mondays," in 1972. Besides a spate of film work—including a segment for Walt Disney Co.'s ill-fated "Return to Oz" and a first feature, "The Adventures of Mark Twain," released early this year—the 22-person company has recently expanded into tv commercials.

Vinton's latest entry may be its most inspired, a 30-second spot for the California Raisin Advisory Board, Fresno, set to Marvin Gaye's "I Heard It Through the Grapevine."

Aside from representing one of the most appropriate uses of '60s music amid the deluge of it turning up in advertising, the spot offers a hilarious conga line of raisins—finger-snapping their way past other potential snacks in their too-cool sunglasses and white gloves.

The commercial, conceived by Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, seems to show an endless line of raisins; in truth, there were only four models, elongated thanks to a matteing technique.

Production took 12 weeks, about average for a Claymation spot.

While conventional animation has given way in many quarters to computers and other time-saving innovations, clay remains "low technology," says Vinton assistant producer Marilyn Zornado. "A person really sits in front of the camera and sculpts."

Animators use a special clay that never hardens, laboriously moving the figures frame-by-frame to create the illusion of motion.

The company, which claims to be the only one specializing solely in this technique, currently handles several recurring commercial characters.

They include KFC's transforming "We do chicken right" fowl and the Noid, Domino's' Pizza-defiling mascot (AA, Sept. 22).

Vinton also is considering another feature film project, to begin production next year. Will that cut into its time for commercial work? Oh no," Ms. Zornado said. "We run a very tight ship here." Even if it is made of clay.#

DMB&B pares staff

Layoffs hit N.Y., S.F.; Atlanta unit is sold

By STEWART ALTER

New York—D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, in major steps to streamline its U.S. operations in the face of a sluggish economy and disinflation, last week laid off 63 employes in its New York and San Francisco offices and sold its Atlanta agency.

DMB&B let go 52 of its 605 employes here, an 8.6% staff reduction, and plans to reduce nonpersonnel costs by 10%.

In San Francisco, DMB&B laid off 11 of its 54-person staff, a 20.3% cutback.

Also last week, DMB&B sold its Atlanta office to Fahlgren, Swink & Nucifero, creating a $30 million unit of Fahlgren & Swink, Parkersburg, W. Va. Robert Kane, managing director of DMB&B's Atlanta office, becomes vice-chairman of the new shop.

No layoffs were announced in Atlanta, but some are expected soon. No price was revealed on the sale.

The sale of the Atlanta office, which has dropped from a high of $25 million to about $15 million in billings, is part of DMB&B's corporate strategy to divest its smaller regional offices.

"This [laying off of staff] is the hardest part of this business. And we're not alone. There must be 4,000 good advertising people on the streets in New York, and that's just very unfortunate."

—Jack Bowen
DMB&B ceo

DMB&B has put on the block its Bloomington, Minn., office, with $10 million in billings, and plans to close its small DMB&B Latinoamerica unit, Miami (AA, Oct. 20), and sell DMB&B/Houston, with $15.6 million in billings (AA, Aug. 25).

The staff trims were due to disinflation and reduced ad spending, the agency said, rather than merger-related client losses. Other major agencies making recent cuts for similar reasons include Ogilvy & Mather, where 60 people were let go (AA, Oct. 6); DFS Dorland Worldwide, with a staff reduction of nearly 100, and SSC&B, with 40 dismissals (AA, June 30).

"Anybody within a mile of the advertising agency business knows that free growth through media inflation is reduced, and we are driving to become a lean and profitable company without cutting back service to our clients," said Thomas Carey, managing director of DMB&B's New York office.

"Any advertising agency in general and any major agency that is not looking at these things, as all clients are looking at them in their houses, has got to be crazy," he said.

"This [laying off of staff] is the hardest part of this business," said DMB&B chairman-ceo Jack Bowen. "And we're not alone. There must be 4,000 good advertising people on the streets in New York, and that's just very unfortunate."

The timing of the layoffs is related to DMB&B being in its "annual planning pe-

P&G's 'signal' reveals scope of its concern

By STEWART ALTER

When John Smale, chairman-ceo of Procter & Gamble, told company shareholders that the world's biggest advertiser had considered—though ultimately rejected—buying a full-service advertising agency, he was acknowledging that P&G had put on the table an entirely new concept: The mega-in-house agency.

NEWS ANALYSIS

The concern cited by Mr. Smale for rejecting the idea was an old one: Can in-house creativity ever match the work of an independent outside source? But the reason for evaluating the option at all is a new one, reflecting the frustration and anger many national advertisers apparently feel because of agency merger-related events.

The agency megamergers have led many advertisers, including P&G, to reassign millions of dollars in billings and to worry about the quality of their agency relationships. It's hard to be a national advertiser today and not worry about loss of control, not only of the client/agency relationship but of the total advertising process.

If the management of agencies seems to be in such transition, why not worry? If merging agencies are willing to look at billings as sheer dollar volume that can be traded as easily

Saatchi chills merger talk, pacifies Mars

By LAUREL WENTZ

London—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. moved last week to avoid potential new problems growing out of the agency's May buyout of Ted Bates Worldwide.

Among the developments:

- After concluding an intensive review of its two major U.S. units, Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide and Bates, Saatchi has decided not to merge the shops, leaving O. Milton Gossett as Compton chairman-ceo and Donald Zuckert as Bates chairman-ceo.
- To pacify Mars Inc. in London, Saatchi & Saatchi has given up $14.6 million in international billings from Nestle-owned Carnation pet foods and Rowntree Mackintosh, the U.K. confectionery products giant. Mars is a major global client of Bates, and Bates in London handles $30 million of Mars' $55

Tv stations factor in big 'Cos' price

By WAYNE WALLEY

The greatest auction in tv syndication history starts today as sealed station bids for the offnetwork run of "The Cosby Show" are opened in New York.

Syndicator Viacom Enterprises is promoting actor-comedian Bill Cosby's show as "The Cosby Factor" to identify this awesome network performer who consistently brings in 50-plus Nielsen shares even in repeat.

The Fox Broadcasting Co. stations, which will be part of the Fox tv network that started this month with "The Late Show Starring Joan Rivers," are expected to be in the "Cosby" bidding, but the fourth network will not. Network officials at Los Angeles-based Fox have said they will use only original programing.

Viacom has positioned "Cosby" as a "station breaker," calling it the "single most powerful programing opportunity in the history of tv syndication" and stating flat out that "Cosby" will crush whatever programing goes against it.

But bone-crushing does not come cheap. To "break" the other station, the winners in the "Cosby" bidding will have to pay record prices for a syndicated half-hour sitcom.

Viacom expects to take in as much as $500 million over the next five years.

Even if the syndicated "Cosby" performs to its most ambitious expectations, it probably will emerge as the most expensive loss-leader in syndication.

"I think it has the makings of a disaster," said Jim Gabbert, owner of KOFY-TV, San Francisco, an independent station. "At the price it will go for in this market, I'd have to sell spots with guarantees to maybe get my money back if it does well. If it flops, I'll be running

Brown-Forman plan erupts into Ky. family feud

By JULIE FRANZ and BRIAN LOWRY

There is a good old family feud at Brown-Forman, resulting from a planned restructuring of the $1.3 billion company.

Among the prospects faced by the Louisville, Ky.-based company: Potential executive and sales staff cuts at Jack Daniel Distillery and the faltering California Cooler division, and a consolidation of B-F's $94 million advertising budget. Also on tap is a review of the six agencies now on its roster combined with new heat on agencies to stay "on track," B-F insiders said.

The opening shot in the feud is chairman-ceo W.L. Lyons (Lee) Brown's intention to consolidate Jack Daniel Distillery into the B-F Spirits unit. That plan is so staunchly opposed by Mr. Brown's brother, Martin Brown, that it reportedly forced the latter's resignation earlier this month. He was B-F vice-chairman and Jack Daniel chairman.

An official company statement attributed the resignation to "a dispute over centralization," but the company refused to elaborate. Insiders ascribe Martin Brown's opposition to impending losses of con-

Nissan: Is it losing its edge?

By CLEVELAND HORTON

Nissan Motor Corp. has spent more than $240 million over 18 months to advertise "The name is Nissan." But newspaper classified ads still list used Nissan dealers under "D"—for Datsun.

The Datsun name change continues to dog Carson, Cal.-based Nissan. Initially, Nissan executives hoped 18 months would be adequate to complete the change. But now, 24 months into the conversion, nearly 20% of Nissan's 1,100 dealers still deal under a Datsun sign.

The name isn't the whole game, however. Mounting pressures from price increases and a host of new entries to the U.S. market are pitting Japanese car and truck marketers against some formidable competitors, including each other.

American Honda and Toyota Motor Sales are responding with aggressive tactics. Toyota is boosting ad spending as much as 30%, to more than $200 million, for its 1987 models. Honda is increasing its budget, although not to the same degree, and rebalancing its tv strategy on spot markets.

Nissan, the No. 2 Japanese automotive import, surprisingly isn't following suit.

The company is holding the line on spending at an estimated $165 million while maintaining its policy of using network tv to convey the corporate "name is Nissan" theme. It's relying on print ads for model-specific promotions.

Industry analysts suggest that in order to survive, imports must adopt a niche-marketing approach to selling cars. Nissan's line lends itself well to that kind of marketing, though analysts say Nissan hasn't followed through. The entry-level Sentra, best-selling import in 1985, is well established as a price leader and, at the higher end, Nissan's image-leading 300 ZX has carved a deep niche in the sporty car category.

Nissan's U.S. marketing problems are exacerbated by the shaky condition of its Japanese parent company, which is expected to post a loss in the current year. Most of the problem relates to the radical shift in the yen/dollar currency exchange, once 240 yen to the dollar but now around 150 to the dollar.

In an apparent bid to maintain its U.S. market share, Nissan has not been as aggressive as Toyota and Honda in raising prices to reflect the weaker dollar. Average Nissan prices climbed 12% from the rollout of the 1986 line to the launch this fall of the '87s. For the same period, average Toyota and Honda prices were up 14%.

Auto analyst Alan Knight of Paine Webber Mitchell Hutchins, New York, believes Nissan's struggles in the U.S. are tied directly to its parent's financial condition. "You can't separate theoretical marketing approaches from the company's financial condition and its ability to support the distribution network," she said.

She added: "The handwriting is Youthful stars play it to Max for GF coffee

By JULIE FRANZ

General Foods raised some eyebrows in June when it hired actors Mariel Hemingway, Justine Bateman and Bronson Pinchot to promote its Maxwell House Instant coffee. Those eyebrows are about to go up again.

A five percentage point gain in last month's adWatch survey gave the brand 27.8% of first mentions, which is the highest top-of-mind advertising awareness score for a coffee advertiser so far this year.

The celebrities are featured calmly touting the benefits of Maxwell House Instant coffee in low-key commercials remarkable for the few mentions given to the brand name. Ogilvy & Mather, New York, created the campaign.

The campaign, which includes tv and page print ads, is most popular with 18-to-24-year-olds, where Maxwell House garners 38% of its responses. More than 32% of those responding to the brand over-all are female while 24% are male. Additionally, the brand's awareness score is highest in the Northeast and South-Central regions.

Maxwell House and Procter & Gamble's Folgers brand have been trading possession of the No. 1 position in the coffee category for the past year. In the September survey, Folgers held the No. 2 position with 24.7% of first mentions.

General Foods' Sanka brand remained third in the coffee category with 4% of first mentions, Hills Bros. was in fourth with 2.6% of first mentions. Nestle's Taster's Choice brand received 1.8% of first mentions, placing it in fifth place.

AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb.

Ad awareness is measured by asking a nationally projected sample to name the advertising that first comes to mind—over-all and in a variety of product categories—from among all advertising seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days. During September, 1,000 consumers were polled by telephone.

Those changes in advertising awareness that are deemed statistically significant by adWatch researchers can be attributed to more than sample variation.

Ad agencies get yeas, nays

But clients place ad shops above pr agencies in survey

By Thomas Duncan and Linda Lazier Smith

Both advertising and pr agencies have an image problem. They spend too much money and they need to be stronger in research, marketing knowledge and planning, according to a recent national survey of clients.

The survey—sponsored by Golin/Harris Communications, Chicago (and conducted by Thomas Duncan, one of this article's co-authors), asked 1,545 marketing and communications managers (283, or 19%, responded) from a cross section of consumer and industrial clients to rate agencies' abilities in nine key areas: Strategic thinking, creative ability, presentation skills, marketing knowledge, cost control, client service, planning, program execution and research.

Although both groups have their strengths, ad agencies' abilities scored better over-all than pr agencies, the study found. Pr agencies scored markedly lower in "strategic thinking." And in a few areas, both flunked.

Ad agencies' weakest abilities, according to the findings, were in "research" and "cost control." Only 36% considered ad agencies to be strong in "research"; even fewer respondents—18%—said ad agencies were strong in "cost control."

"Most ad agencies believe that the client has never-ending dollars," a product manager said. A marketing services director commented, "They easily make things more elaborate than necessary."

Slightly fewer than half of those who responded said ad agencies were strong in "marketing knowledge" (49%) and "planning" (48%).

One pr-promotions manager who believed ad agencies were weak in these areas said: "Deadlines often create an urgency, which causes a lack of product knowledge. Many times an agency is only interested in advertising programs. They should be more interested in integrating these programs with the rest of the company's programs."

As might be expected, the ad agencies' greatest perceived strength was "creativity," which 85% of the respondents said was strong (based on the combined ratings of "very strong" and "strong").

Unexpected—and probably disappointing to adpeople—was that two of their higher scores were for procedural functions rather than bottom-line related activities. "Presentation skills" was rated strong by 81% and "client service" was found to be strong by 63%. Two-thirds of the clients said ad agencies were strong in "program execution." Only 59% perceived ad agencies' abilities in "strategic thinking" as strong, a function considered the basis for good advertising by most clients.

Pr agencies rated weaker than ad agencies in each of the nine areas evaluated. "They're just not as sophisticated as current ad agencies," said a brand manager at a package-goods company. Pr agencies' strongest area was a procedural function—"presentation skills"—which 71% rated strong. Next strongest was "program execution," which 62% said was strong. A little more than half (53%) said pr agencies were strong in "creativity." This was 32 percentage points lower than the ad agencies' score in this area. Pr agencies also were perceived as being much weaker than ad agencies in "strategic thinking." Only 32% perceived pr agencies as being strong in this area, compared with 59% for ad agencies.

"If the pr agency does not have an active working knowledge of the company and its product, it is worthless," said one marketing communications manager. In defense of pr, a marketing consultant said the "bottom line is how well the company involves the agency." Exactly half the respondents said pr agencies' "client service" was strong, and 40% said the same of their "planning." A pr director who rated pr agencies strong in all nine areas said, however, that these agencies "need to better understand client's corporate culture."

Golin/Harris Communications president Tom Harris said: "Results aren't really surprising to us and to other pr professionals who specialize in marketing-support public relations. Clients are offering public relations an unprecedented opportunity to prove that we can move the needle. Public relations should be challenged to develop programs that are on strategy, that reach consumers in unexpected and exciting ways."

(Because the majority of respondents were in marketing, the respondents who were in pr and corporate communications positions were culled out and analyzed separately. Although this group generally rated pr agencies slightly higher than the over-all sample, they still rated ad agencies stronger on all nine functions.)

"I'm not surprised" said Loet Velmans, chairman-ceo of Hill & Knowlton. "It's probably a pretty accurate reflection. . . .There are a whole lot of areas of public relations that marketing people aren't concerned with, and consequently their perceptions aren't based on experience of our abilities in many of the other areas in which we work.

"Only in the last few years have we been asked to help in a major way in the marketing area. Therefore, if they [people in marketing positions] compare public relations agencies' to ad agencies' performance in these areas and say, 'Boy, have these pr people got a lot to learn!' I would agree with them."

Len Matthews, president of the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies, says one reason ad agencies were rated higher was because "public relations efforts are more difficult to measure; advertising is a more precise craft because advertising activities are more identifiable.

"Pr agencies have come a long way in being more professional. When I think about the pr firms I dealt with when I was an account executive back in the '50s, they were more publicity oriented. Now they are more strategic in their work, many just as professional as ad agencies."

Asked about the future of the two groups, Mr. Matthews said he "would expect the difference in the perceptions to narrow." Most of the 10 largest public relations agencies, he added, "are now owned by ad agencies. T desire will be to make these pr agencies professional and as full service as their pa ent companies."

The need to find more economical ways reach potential consumers and to cut throu the growing media clutter suggest pr agenci have an opportunity to play a bigger role the marketing mix, as Mr. Harris pointed ou

The findings of this study suggest that t two groups that have the biggest responsib ity for making clients look good need to ta a good look at their own images.#

Mr. Duncan is an associate professor of a vertising at Ball State University, Munc Ind. Ms. Lazier Smith is an assistant profe sor of advertising at Ohio State Universi Columbus.

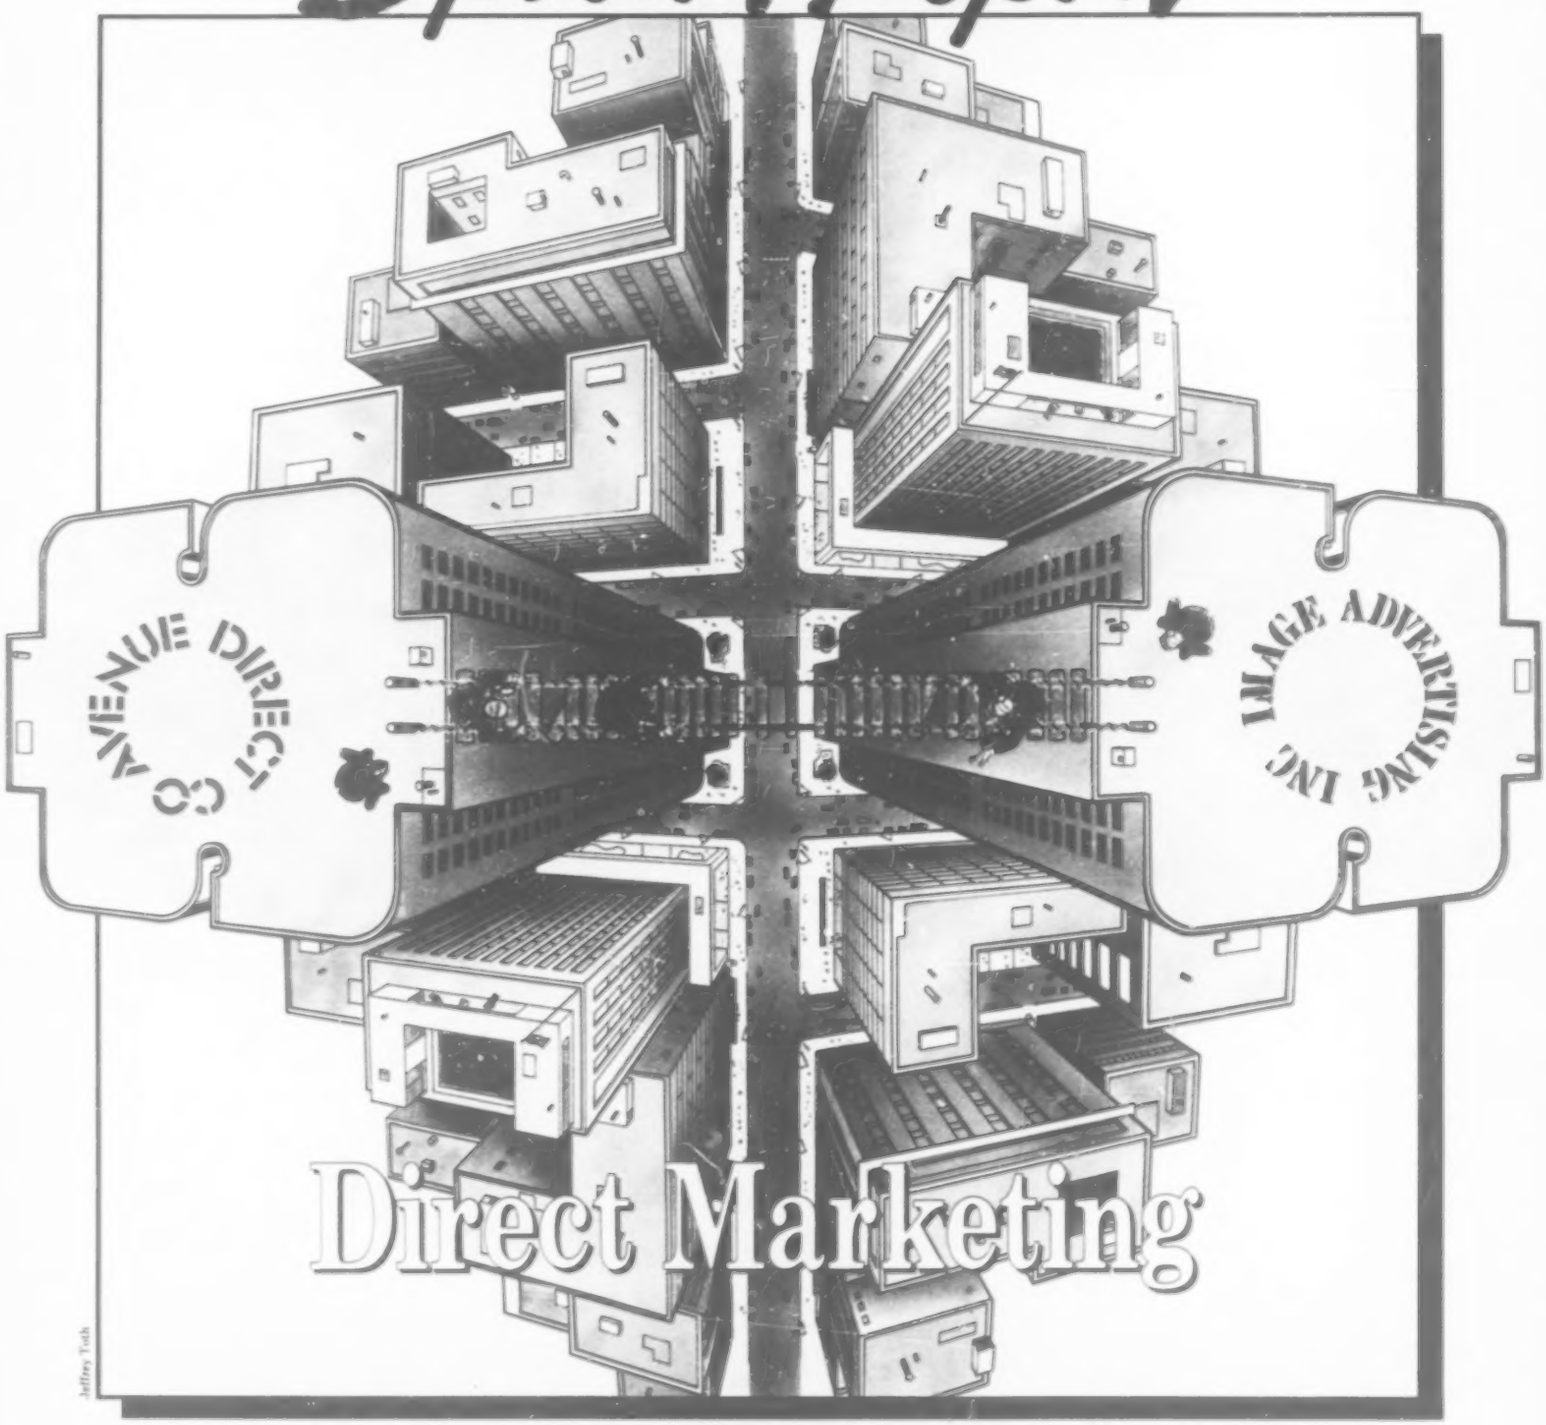
Special Report



Agencies test bridge to new partners

It's no mystery that the gap between direct marketing and general image advertising has been bridged. After all, nine of the top ten agencies listed in ADVERTISING AGE's "U.S. Advertising Agency Profiles, 1986 Edition" possess direct marketing subsidiaries or divisions.

The bridge between the two, however, is missing an occasional plank, and walking it is still a challenge. In the rush to join the trend, direct marketing and general advertising agencies leaped into each other's arms but often weren't quite sure what to do with each other afterward.

Some heralded a new era of creativity, and certainly many subsequent general market and direct response efforts have been colored by influences from the other side. Others foresaw phenomenal new business opportunities, particularly the entrance of package goods companies into direct marketing. But the boom in packaged goods participation has yet to materialize, and some direct marketing and general ad agencies have gracefully bowed out of their unions.

Nevertheless, the disciplines have been connected, irrefutably changing the face of marketing. In the long run, direct marketing will have the greater influence, says Stan Rapp, chairman of Rapp & Collins, a New York-based subsidiary of Omnicom Group, creating an era of one-to-one strategic marketing in which database information is compiled and utilized to better target, address and sell products to consumers—and then establish a continuing relationship with them.

"There is a basic shift in thinking," he says, "from stressing immediate sales vs. the lifetime value of customer relationships."

To maximize marketing efforts, "companies should take 5% to 10% of their measured media and promotional budgets and put it into one-to-one strategic marketing programs."

It's a bridge, it's just not the kind of bridge many marketers may have thought they'd be crossing.

ness, some of its competitors seem content to sit on the sidelines. John Laughton, merchandising manager, Piscataway, N.J.-based American Standard, questions the promotional value of Kohler's catalog program and says his company has no plans to sell its products or related products directly to consumers.

He acknowledges some benefit from Kohler's catalog, however. "Kohler has done some innovative things," Mr. Laughton says. "It is better for all of us [in the industry] for there to be more activity—to make people more bathroom-conscious."

Chicago-based Gerber Plumbing also does not sell direct to consumers. "In order to pull that off [catalog selling] you have to be the size of Kohler," says Ron Grabski, marketing director.

"They may use one part of the business to subsidize the other. They may advertise a towel rack and end up selling a bathtub," he says. "The only way the catalogs are going to be successful is if they turn a profit. I don't see that their over-all business is going to increase more if they just increase their ad spending."

Kohler, which sells its bathroom fixtures only through distributors, has come up with a device to measure the impact the catalog has had in creating new customers for its plumbing products. In the current catalog, a coupon offers a rebate tied to invoice amounts for plumbing products.

"We realize not many people will buy a bathtub because of the rebate, but if you needed a faucet, now would be the time to replace it," says Ms. Baiden. The first rebate, however, was for a bathtub—a normal bathtub, not a top of the line model.

The catalog also features photos of new Kohler products and explains how to decorate with Kohler Color Coordinates, a system for matching its products with those of other companies. "This is the first time we are devoting so much space to Kohler products," says Ms. Baiden.

The company mailed its September catalog—its sixth since 1984 and third of this year—to 850,000 names. To date, nearly 20,000 customers have ordered products from Kohler catalogs. Consumers appear to be keeping the books because Kohler still is receiving orders from early books and coupons from ads that ran in the early years.

Ads for the catalog have appeared in shelter magazines including Home, Metropolitan Home and The New Yorker. Kohler ran a listing for the catalog in the September issue of House Beautiful, the only magazine in which an ad is currently running.

The catalog also has been advertised via Catalogs U.S.A., New York, which buys pages in many magazines and newspapers including Country Living, House & Garden, Metropolitan Home, Smithsonian, The New York Times Magazine and USA Today.

The advertising tie-in is working both ways now. The current catalog's cover features one of "to increase the tie between the catalog and consumer advertising," Ms. Baiden says. "This is the first time we have done this, and the entire book's presentation is built on the flavor and presentation of the ad."

Kohler's management is pleased with the outcome of its catalog program—and not only for pure bottom-line considerations. "Catalogs are one of Mr. Kohler's loves," she says. "That's another reason we became involved."

But the catalog also is helping Kohler create new business. "It has become a revenue producer in an area from which we had no revenue generated before," Ms. Baiden says. "It has helped to expand our customer franchise."

Distiller finds little comfort as cataloger

Kohler Co. first became involved in the catalog business because of Herbert Kohler Jr.'s love of the medium. The company soon found that its president and chief executive officer's fancy could help address its lack of corporate identity among consumers and generate additional revenue.

Other companies have tried to do the same. Although it is not commonplace, more companies are going into the catalog business—often without branded merchandise, says Roberta Maneker, vp-public relations with the Direct Marketing Assn., New York.

"The success or failure of a catalog depends on the catalog itself. If it's a good catalog, it will sell," she says. "It doesn't matter what business a company is in, increased sales are the inevitable byproduct of a well-produced, successful catalog."

For much the same reasons as Kohler, B-F Spirits division of Louisville, Ky.-based Brown-Forman Corp. produced a catalog for its Southern Comfort brand. "There are a lot of parallels between the Kohler catalog and the Southern Comfort project," says Gail Koach, manager-direct marketing for Southern Comfort. The Paddle Wheel Shop catalog was begun in 1981 as part of sales promotion to enhance brand imagery, she says.

"We did a standard telephone research study of customers," Ms. Koach says. "We found that even with the receipt of one catalog it did enhance brand imagery."

The catalog, which offered giftware inspired by the South, including housewares, Victorian lamps, plantation hats, dried flower wreaths, glassware and bar accessories—only some of which were brand identified—ran for five years through spring, 1986.

During that time, a million catalogs were mailed annually.

In the beginning the company mailed catalogs to people who had written for recipes or to ask where they could get merchandise carrying the Southern Comfort name and logo, says David Higgins, vp, senior brand manager. Later the company purchased lists from list brokers.

The catalog was not Southern Comfort's first attempt at direct marketing. "When Southern Comfort was an independent company it already had a good track record with direct marketing," says Ms. Koach. "We sold key chains, happy hour accessories and high-quality glassware

After five years Southern Comfort decided its catalog was not cost-effective.

—not all of which was brand identified. We included an order form in a recipe booklet bound into national magazines. So the catalog was a natural jumping-off point."

Despite the catalog's being a natural addition to the brand's marketing program and having accomplished its goal of increasing brand awareness, Southern Comfort's experience proves the catalog business is not for every manufacturer.

"It was not cost effective for the company," she says, so it was discontinued.

Southern Comfort was spending $500,000 a year on the catalog, and for the number of Southern Comfort users it was reaching, the company believed it could find better methods, Mr. Higgins says.

He cited the costs of fulfillment and inventory as an added problem. "We couldn't control cost of the catalog. Also, the catalog should go to Southern Comfort customers, and we found the demographics of our mailing lists didn't fit.

"Our research showed the catalog positively changed the attitude toward Southern Comfort," Mr. Higgins says.

"But we're not in the mail order business; we are a distilled spirits business."

The catalog was both fun and fulfilling, he says. "We hated to give it up. It was a hard decision to make."

her survey were the results from the car and truck category. Ad awareness for General Motors' and Ford Motor Co.'s advertising seesawed last month, with GM gaining 4 points and Ford losing 4.2 points.

Ad awareness for General Motors (as a brand) hovered between 3% and 4% for the previous nine months, but a boost from the ad blitz touting lower financing last month sent the General Motors ad score soaring up to 8.5% of first mentions.

The GM response rate, rarely high enough to make it into the top five in auto maker ad awareness, was third last month.

Ford, continually the best-recalled auto advertiser, remains in first, despite its 4.2 point loss, with an ad awareness score of 18.5. Interestingly, each time GM gains in its share of advertising awareness, Ford loses. While Ford also ran ads for cut-rate financing, GM had more cars to clear out, so it loaded up the airwaves.

Rounding out the car and truck category in the No. 2 spot is GM's Chevrolet with 12.2% of ad awareness; No. 4 is Toyota with 7.5%, and Dodge is fifth with 4.4%.

September's 10 best-recalled advertisers (without requesting a specific product category) were, in descending order: Coca-Cola, Pepsi-Cola, General Motors, Miller/-Miller Lite, McDonald's, Bartles & Jaymes (E. & J. Gallo), Ford, Budweiser/Bud Light (Anheuser-Busch), Chevrolet and Burger King. More than 56% of those queried (unaided) were unable to recall a specific advertisement.

New to the top 10 in September were GM, Chevy and Burger King, which return after a hiatus in August. Those three brands' advertising bumps ads from K mart, Levi Strauss and Seven-Up from the top 10.

- In the wine category, California Cooler's ad recall lost 2.1 percentage points, reducing its score to 3% in September, but keeping the brand in fourth place among wine advertisers. In August, the brand's $20 million "real stuff" campaign had helped it gain 2.7 percentage points. Bartles & Jaymes remained No. 1 with 12.4% of ad awareness, E. & J. Gallo is second with 10.4%, Riunite third with 10.0% (up 3.5% from August) and Seagram's fifth with 2.5% of top-of-mind ad recall in the category.
- Among financial institutions, E.F. Hutton gained 2.6 points to 6.1% (first place) while Merrill Lynch garnered 2.9 additional points of awareness, moving to 5.1% (second place). American Express, which usually scores well under the credit-card category, also is getting some notice among financial institutions. The brand placed third in that category with 1.5% of first mentions.
- IBM's four-page spread in the Wall Street Journal and other advertising for its entire personal-computer line helped the brand move 3.7 percentage points to 21.7% of first mentions in the computer category. Ads for IBM remain in the No. 2 slot behind Apple's 22.1% of ad awareness. Commodore remains a distant third with 2.7%.#
